The party's budget spokesman, Mr Neil Balfour said: "The efforts of our opponents to point a gun at the (EEC) council levelled specifically at the head of the British Government - have failed."

The committee had proposed to put the £171.6m into a released only if the December EEC summit in Athens produced a clear concept for a long term reform of the EEC finances.

Nevertheless the parliament can still use its powers to stop Britain's 1983 rebate as a means to pressure the heads of covernment to agree on reform.

Price rises since 1963 led by fuel

The fastest-rising prices in the past 20 years have been for heating oil, coal and smokeless fuel, rates and water charges. Items showing the slowest rises have included gas, telephone charges, and whisky.

Those are some of the details from a Treasury breakdown of price changes since 1963, which shows that overall, prices have gone up 525 per cent.

The biggest increase in that period has been for heating oil, which has gone up 76 per cent more than prices generally.

Fuel and light have outstripped other prices by 34 per cent, with domestic coal and cent, with domestic coal and turns to have conversations smokeless fuel also showing a with him." 48 per cent real increase.

According to the Treasury, the general level of prices rose more than sixfold in the 20 years, so that it would take £6.25 in 1983 to buy goods which cost £1 in 1963.

But, it says, earnings have gone up even faster, with the average family showing a tenfold rise in take-home pay, from £15 a week to £151.

Geoffrey Smith

Mr Cecil Parkinson can expect a comforting reception when he speaks to the conference today. The mood at Blackpool is to close ranks, to procizim to the world that "we won't be programmed by the press". One hears the complaint time and egain that the episode has received exaggersted attention from the popular papers and that for Mr Parkinson to resign now would be to allow him to be hounded from office,

The party's determination to stand firm has no doubt been much strengthened by Mrs Thatcher's firmness. It would be doubly damaging to the Conservatives if Mr Parkinson were to depart at this stage. Not only would the party be marked by scandal, but the Prime Minister's blaff would have been called. For just about the first time on a major political issue, as this has become, she would have been forced to surrender an unequivocal position.

It would also. I believe, be damaging to British politics in general if Mr Parkinson were to resign at this point. There have to be standards in public life, but if there is not to be bypocrisy, malice and pruri-ence, it is necessary to be clear what those standards should Pleasant though it would be if everyone who held public responsibility was of blameless personal conduct, that is simply not possible. History suggests that it is also not relevant: a person's capacity to hold high office cannot be measured by his distance from the angels.

It is right, though, to insist on rigorous standards in the conduct of public responsibilities. For example, I believe that it is correct to be strict about any whiff of corruption and to regard it as a grave offence to lie to the House of Private conduct is relevant only insofar as it affects a person's capacity to perform ais public duties. It might affect either his personal performance or the confidence he commands. A frequent dered incapable of consistent efficiency, and popular respect for a politician might be so diminished by scandal that he could not exercise the leadership required of him. But these should be pragmatic judgments in determining a person's fitness for high office.

Unfair to judge too soon

How does Mr Parkinson measure up to these criteria? He has not been guilty of any misdeed in the conduct of his public responsibilities. So far es oue knows, he has been frank in disclosing his private reisconduct. That misconduct should not itself be a reason for his resignation. But might it indirectly have destroyed his capacity?

It could have been in one of two ways. His nerve could have been broken, his energy critically weakened, by what must have been a harrowing experi-The more personal sympathy one extends to him for the buffeting he has received the more one should be prepared to consider this possibility. Or, no matter how resilient he may be, he may find that the storm does not subside, that however much he may talk about trade and industry nobody is interested in any-thing he says on any topic beyond his private life. If that were to happen, it might make his task impossible.

But these are judgments that can fairly be made only after a period of time. If Mr Parkinson were to resign now, he would be going because of the hue and cry, not because of the indirect long-term consequences of the kue and cry.

There is another separate consideration. After a while an energetic, ambitious politician in his early fifties, who is told on all sides that he can now expect to rise no higher, might well lose his appetite for public life. In that case he might drift cut of active politics, or at least get of government, in a few

But I am not implying that he ought to resign after a decent interval. If none of these doubts is realized there is no reason why he should do so because of this episode now or in the future.

The British economy, he said, had been recovering from the recession rather faster than their major European competitors and major European competitors and there was no sign of recovery petering out. It looked as if the economy was growing by up to 3 per cent rather than the 2 per cent forecast at the time of the Budget. For the first time since the recession, the number of people in work had been to rise as in.

He emphasized that he was not going to follow the primrose path of financing tax reductions by letting borrowing rip. Hard choices would have to be made but excessive public expenditure and the taxation required to finance it was the enemy not the source of new jobs.

This would not only be the height of folly but a betrayal of Britain's future. Changing course now would mean a betrayal of every voter who put a cross against : Conservative candidate in June.

Mr Louis Browne, Birkenhead, opposing the motion, declared himself as "a wet and proud of it." He told the representatives: "It is about time the unemployed people of this country were given some

Mr Geoffrey Gilson, Beaconfield Young Conservatives, said that he opposed the motion because it did not recognize that to meet the two major objectives of economic policy the government must withdraw its commitment to make available for free welfare provided by state The two objectives were to reduce taxation and lower inflation.

By all means let the Government continue to ensure access by all to proper health care and education but, where possible, that provision should be from the private sector and, where practical, the consumer should be made to pay.

Legislation promise for voters on holiday

The Government has decided to take action to enable holidaymakers away on polling day to vote in parliamentary and European elections, Mr David Mellor, Under-Secretary of State at the Home Office, told the conference at the end of a debate on electoral law.

It would also make some provision for those living abroad to vote in those elections and increase the deposit to a sensible level to deter the purely frivolous candidate. The Government hoped to intro-duce legislation on those three issues in the 1984-85 session of Parliament.

The conference voted for a motion asking the Government to legislate to allow any person on the electoral register and who was away on holiday on election day to be treated as an absent voter and be eligable to vote by post or proxy. Mr Mellor said he endorsed the motion and agreed that reform was long overdue. Perhaps as many as two million people were distran-chised at the last election because of

'Defence is our first duty'

Mr Michael Heseltine, Secretary of State for Defence, in his response to the defence debate, said that he and the ministers of the Ministry of Defence whole-heartedly commended the motion. The Government's first duty was to defending this nation. Its strategy elsewhere in the world relied upon highly trained and mobile forces capable of the

He said that he wished sometimes that the words "education" and "training" could be merged. Until recently, training had not been high enough on their list of priorities. The Youth Training Scheme was not about political education but it was about

Miss Sally Marshall, chairman of East Midlands Young Conservatives, said when opening the debate, on employment, that the Youth Training Scheme gave young people the opportunity to escape from the vicious circle of no job without training and no training without 2 job.

The new scheme was better than the Youth Opportunities Programme and would provide 460,000 young people with pride and the training for a real job, she said.

Mr Arthur Newell, Enfield and Southgate Conservative Trade Unionists, supporting the motion, said that he wholeheartedley welcomed the training scheme, although he would prefer real jobs.

It offered the only training opportunity available to many young people, but, as a trade unionist, he would be failing in his duty if he did not try to improve the quality of the scheme by increasing the £25-a-week allowance, paying travelling expenses, and providing luncheon vouchers. The danger would come from the militant Marxists and Trotskyltes in the unions who were hell-bent on seeing it

Mrs Marjory Morris, Wantage, opposing the motion, said the implication was that the scheme would make up for the inadequacies of the education system. Were they not being asked to pay a second time for services they had already paid for handsomely through any international competitor. education? In the present economic climate, subjects such as drama, music, peace studies, and sociology should be relegated to their proper place as leisure and fringe activities while money and effort was concentrated on the more number but essential subjects to produce more employable youngsters.

Mr Tim Bates, Gower, said the scheme was needed but they sould beware of believing that by itself it could solve all the problems. There was a skills gap between the present school-leavers and the new recruits needed to work with the new technologies; the scheme could help to solve that problem, but it was no good investing in training for the new technologies if the Government was not prepared to invest in the elopment of those technologies

Mr Morrison, replying to the debate, said that, provided the training was of the right quality, Britain had for the first time the endations on which could be built not only a better trained workforce but also one that could take on and beat

It was the Government's job to convince those who were setting out on their careers that not only was it in their own interests to provide a good service but also that by doing so they would have a far more rewarding life. Today there was a much better understanding of the need for those old-fashioned words "discipline", "pride", and "hard work" when it came to doing a job properly, and that is what the Youth Training Scheme was all about,

The younger generation did not like being patronized. The vast majority of them were not drop-out punk rockers. That was why about 200,000 16 and 17-year-olds had already, of their own accord, decided to take advantage of an offer of a year's training which had not been available to their elder brothers and sisters. For those who left school aged 16 with few qualifications the prospects must appear at first glance gloomy, but he could say to them and their parents: "For the first time ever you have got the chance to bridge that gap between school and mark if was take between school and work. If you take it and work at it then you stand to benefit every bit as much as those who were better at their books." The Youth Training Scheme provided a sense of hope

From Richard Hanson Tokyo

Kakuei Tanaka, a former Prime Minister who bulldozed his way to the pinnacle of power in postwar Japan, was found guilty yesterday by Tokyo district court for his role in the Lockheed bribery scandal. He was sentenced to four years in prison and ordered to pay 500 million yen (over £1.4m), an amount equal to the alleged bribe he received.

Mr Tanaka, who is 65, immediately appealed, declaring that he will fight to prove his innocence before the High Court, a process that could take several years. Mr Tanaka indicated in a statement, after his release on 300 million yen bail, that he will refuse to quit politics and remain in the Diet (parliament) as long as he has the "understanding and support" of the people. That decision could create political turmoil.

Though widely anticipated, the verdict and harsh sentence stunned politicians. Never before has a former Japanese Prime Minister been convicted by a Japanese court for crimes committed while serving in the nation's highest office.

Compared with the composer's massive opera Saint-François d'Assise, planned for Paris this November, the forces are modest: the spectrum of bird-song, colour, earth, air and sea sounds is suspended in a rare, almost perfect equipoise between sound and silence, action and meditation.

The busy-ness, the dispersal what Messiaen has called "the surfeit of energy" of "Cedar Breaks", for instance, is juxtaposed with the extraordinary horn solo of "Interstellar Call". Though John B. Keane's Big Maggie (Douglas Fairbanks Theater) is touted as a long-running Dublin hit, one can only surmise that the Irish do not have television soap operas. If they did, Big Maggie's domestic squabbles, scandals and stereotyped characters would bore by comparison. Perhaps the play needs a spirited native cast to endear itself; here it receives a production which seldom even

There is some sparkle in Friends at the Billie Holliday Theatre, but the author, Samm-Art Williams, is unlikely to repeat the success of his 1980 Tony-nominee Home unless he decides whether he is writing domestic comedy or farce. The comedy, about a woman who is a giver and wants the people around her to even up the score a little, has promise but not focus. The farce, with the woman's blind husband and blind former lover living in her huge house but unaware of each other until Act II, when they miss and then succeed in meeting in hilarious slapstick encoun-ters, also has merit but takes an interminable first act to set up.

The one tonic to arrive lately is The Vi-Ton-Ka Medicine Show, the very last of its kind to play Manhattan and scheduled only until next Sunday because most of its authentic performers are now too elderly for an open run. The show is in celebration of off-Broadway's American Place Theatre's twentieth anniversary. Because its mandate is producing American plays, the company decided to give a fond farewell to one of the country's three indigenous theatrical forms. Musical comedy survives, but minstrelsy is dead, and so, after this, is the genuine Medicine Show, a form which inspired vaudeville and spawned such performers as Houdini, Buster Keaton and Red Skelton.

As the MC/ventriloquist/cowboy singer/comic Colonel Buster Doss explains, the Medicine Show was the knew for over a century. Its roots show for worse in some painfully corny jokes, but mostly for better in jolly music ranging from Blue Grass and blues lustily sung by the 82-year-old Mary Smith McClain to a tune played on a flit gun and an anvil chorus duet of organ and bull-whip. A great delight is Leroy Watts's Chair Dance, a soft-shoe routine performed sitting in order to lure customers down front for "Doc" Fred Bloodgood's tonic-selling spiel, de-livered so smoothly one longs to be a sucker. The contrast between the "down-home" flavour of the Medicine Show and the sleek sophisti-cation of A Chorus Line illustrates the rich variety in New York theatre. They were once novelties, and can give us hope each time the house lights dim this season that we may encounter their successors.

Somehow it does not seem, any more, quite so easy as that. We do not have to swallow Robert Venturi's Learning from Las Vegas whole in order to have the feeling that function is an altogether wider concept than the first theorists of the modern movement allowed. and that many objects, from whole buildings down, serve their function very well, even if it is not a function that liberal humanists approve of. Concepts like "over-decoration" easier to throw around than to define: who says how much is too much? The toaster with the puny decorative motifs on its outside toasts bread just as well as its twin painted matt black, so who are we to shake our heads that most people prefer the first? (Though it is a legitimate beef that those who would prefer the second are not allowed to, because it is presumed they do not exist.) It might be more productive to consider why such preferences exist, instead of taking refuge in generalizations about pandering to the lowest common denomi nator.

The interesting thing about the show is how completely at home apostles of good taste in the Thirties would feel in it. The same Victorian extravaganzas are condemned - the solitary piece of encrusted Belter furniture from America, the newspaper holders made out of embroidered elk hooves - not man, or mostly woman, against faceless authority.

As well as Miss O'Brien, whose swaggering, lip-pursing organizers do know it exists: they have a little section near the end devoted to it - but they seem at a loss as to why it exists, what sensible reasons there might be for breaking up the hegemony of ghastly good taste by letting in a little anarchy, a little vulgarity, a little fantasy, a little life. Of course we all admire Mies van der Rohe. But why should we not also lust, just a little, after those elk-hoof newspaper holders?

But what quickens the work's spirit is its affirmation of rhythm, its joy, too, in melody, and above all the sense of the sanctity of sound's existence in time, epitomized in Messiaen's transmutation of the call of the wood thrush into a perfect aural embodiment of the concept of naming, and of the individuation of creation.

This despite an orchestra whose actual sounds - sweet. rich strings, ringing horns and carefully shaped oboe and cello solos - might have led us to expect rather more. In fact only in the finale, interpretatively the least demanding of the move-ments, did the performance really take wing.

No blame for this could be attached to the solost, Horacio Gutierrez, whose playing proved that you need to be sensitive as well as energetic to do this physically demanding work fullest justice. His sheer ability to play the right notes was astonishing, but more so was the subtlety of his touch.

Perhaps some weight was missing from the first movement; yet it had depth and ability to beat time with reliable tenacity enough. And, despite clarity.

Mr Gutierrez's generally romantic approach, a certain detached quality helped to keep us mindful of the work's classical antecedents and of its legacy to younger German composers.

Mr Conlon's task should have been simpler in Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, with no soloist to attend to and a much less stormy emotional ride to negotiate. But his performance was only business-like, with no first movement expostion repeat and with speeds on the brisk side.

I wonder, too, whether he noticed the timpanist, Alan Cumberland, perpetrating a sadly fashionable heresy by decorating his part with por-tions lifted from the double basses. Stephen Pettitt exciting one-day cricket match between England and New Zealand last month, Radio 3, relaying the cricket as it does every year turned over as from Covent Garden. Just before the switch at 7pm, Ian McIntyre, controller of Radio 3, was asked to hold the opera and let the cricket, now reaching a peak of tension, run on. He refused, feeling that the preferences of Radio I's music listeners called for adherences to the schedules. Next morning, 300 abusive telephone calls and dozens of letters of complaint reached Broadcasting House.

All institutions as venerated as Radio 3 attract opprobium as intense as this in its hostility. For nearly 40 years, two generations of British listeners have developed a devoted allegiance to their unique cultural station, and when things seem out of station, and when things seem out or lees for television. Is it all the nature of the beast, or has Radio 3 fallen on fractious times?

Radio 3 - or the Third Programme it began life - was the child of Sir William Haley, director general of the BBC immediately after the war. He dreamt of founding a network that would have no fixed time points, so that plays, operas and features could run their course regardless of Big Ben, candidate with fluent French, Russian and, more importantly, with no regard for popularity.

At the end of September 1946, the Third Programme came on the air. The Times welcomed its arrival as a "powerful newcomer among the agents of enlightened democracy". And for the most part the Third Programme did precisely what it had set out to do.

Those early years, in the minds and memories of a whole school of listeners, were charmed ones, and they lasted well into the 1960s. Philip French, a producer of talks and documentaries, recalls: "When I started everyone at a department meeting was a poet, a playwright, or a biographer. They wore three-piece suits and bowler hats. When someone was mentioned as a possible speaker, someone else would be bound to ask. But has he got a Third Programme ning?" In those days, no one about whether or not there was an audience: excellence was enough.

Still, the Third Programme had its critics, particularly among the "antihighbrows", both inside Broadcasting House and out. There were complaints about the plummy accents of the presenters, with their ineffable superiority and their Latin and Greek tags, and about the unattractive élitism of putting on programmes no one could

It was under P H Newby, a reserved and patient former talks producer (later winner of the first Booker Prize). that the question of change became more serious. In 1968 Gerry Mansell, a former controller of Radio 4 and the Music Programme, was seconded to redesign and restructure the entire volume of BBC's radio output, which was felt by the board to have fallen into a state of overlap and untidiness. Broadcasting in the Seventies called for a "realignment" of the network that had by now been renamed Radio 3 realigned with Radio 4, leaving 3 with

t the height of the most about 100 hours of serious music each week but only eight of speech.

When plans for the new streamlined service were announced, one hundred and thirty four radio producers wrote to The Times protesting that the glory planned to a live broadcast of Faust of the old network was finally gone and that the Philistines had triumphed.

Nonetheless, the changes went ahead. And when listeners and producers paused to consider they found that nothing fundamental had actually changed. A cultural ghetto had not in fact been created.

The Third Programme is dead: long live the Third Programme" P. H. Newby exclaimed, before being succeeded as controller by Stephen Hearst, an exuberant and mercurial Viennese once described as a "benevolent earthquake", who came to Radio 3 from television and never quite managed to shake off the snobbish reproof all founding fathers of radio feel for television. "I was thought to be

He worried about the balance between listeners complaining that Radio 3 is music and talk and asked himself whether it was right to run a network neither understand nor wanted to hear. Radio 3, as inherited by its sixth controller, Ian McIntyre, in November 1978 was the same byzantine, introverted institution" - as one producer describes it - it has always been. McIntyre arrived at Radio 3 bloodied by an unhappy and controversial period as controller of Radio 4. He was a figure very unlike the restrained laisser faire personalities who had preceeded him. A former Conservative and Norwegian, (he is married to a Norwegian) he is described by col-leagues as a formidable debater with nerves of steel, a man who is clearheaded and who has never been seen to lose his temper. "He's intellectually fearless", but he's also a bit of a prig when it comes to language", one of fter 32 years in which producers had done pretty well what they wished to do, McIntyre intended to be involved. His regular and apparently tough formightly meetings with producers, editors and heads of departments, at which past programmes are analyzed and future ones minutely dissected, are not popular

There was not very much to be done about music, the 5,000 hours a year of nich is the dackbone of the network. "Music is a great machine that trundles on". The trundling has been and continues for many listeners to be the glory and justification of the network, with its 120 or so operas a year, 30 of them live relays, its "Composer of the Week" and its orchestral symphonies. even though critics grumble that there is too much modern music in the early mornings and that increasingly no one can find the music he wants at the times he wants it.

But a war about words was on. Ian McIntyre, who had come from current affairs, cared more than his predecessors about words.

In some ways, he has done no more than push a little faster along the lines written by Newby and Hearst: he has given great emphasis both to the clarity of presentation of programmes and to the spoken material which has been creeping steadily back on to the network over the last ten years. "There seemed to be a feeling once of anything goes on Radio 3," Ian McIntyre says "The network was

The BBC's Third Programme came on the air at 6pm on September 29, 1946, with five to six hours a day at its disposal in which to lead the public into new, unexplored paths in music, speech and drama. Of BBC's four radio networks, Radio 3 is alone in not having lost substantial numbers of listeners in the last decade. Radio 1's share of the average audience of the United Kingdom population over the age of five dropped from 5 per cent in the first quarter of 1972 quarter of 1982. have changed: now you just have to sound educated."

But the department where Ian McIntyre's mood of accountability has encountered most opposition is that of drama. In its heyday in the 1950s and early 1960s, drama was considered one of the Third Programme's prize offerings. People like John Tydeman, a genial, bearded figure now deputy head of drama, were drawn to the BBC by the sheer range and quantity of what could be done in drama in the course of a year. "It was an amazing time," he says. "A wave of playwrights of Pinter's generation did their first work for Radio 3. There was then no National Theatre, no modern plays at the RSC, no television, and the Lord Chancellor exercised a solid censorship on the stage. Robert Boult, Peter Schaffer, John Mortimer all wrote for us. By the end of the 1960s all that had changed. The new playwrights went elsewhere. Only a few people of that early breed, like Tom Stoppard, still write for radio."

Other drama producers are less philosophical, "Things go in periods", said one. "There are moments of apparent freedom, then ones of t all used to be so exciting," one producer said mournfully. "Not just in drama, but everywhere. The spirit of adventure has died." He quoted as example the demise of Sounds Interesting the popular programme of twentieth-century music run by Derek Jewell for tury music run by Derek Jewell for seven years. "There is now a fear of the uncontrollable", he added. "What the network suffers most from today is introversion, lack of proper outside criticism and too much internal interference. We are now getting only a shabby, genteel version of the splen-dour of the past."

Contributors complain that for the first time in their lives they are being castigated for not being "intellectual enough". "Every contributor is fearful of being critical", said one man who has written for Radio 3 for over 10 years. "Radio has a long and vengeful memory. It's extremely Russion in that way. It's all too easy to become a non-

The network itself is, however, healthy. While the other three BBC stations have lost listeners steadily over the last 15 years, Radio 3 thrives. True, figures for listeners are almost impossible to measure with any degree of accuracy, but those available suggest that about 600,000 people a day tune envy of the world: broadcasters point out that nowwhere, not even on France Musique, is the same range and quality of service available. For all the carping that Radio 3 is a "governessy" service with pleasant music allowed only after a wholesome dose of education, spoken or played, there is something dogged, if rather smug, about the loyalty of the regular corps of listeners. The changes they call for are cosmetic not radical - less avant garde music perhaps, more coherence in planning the music programmes.

The fact that Radio, for all its years of democratization, remains one of the most formal in the Western world is not disliked. If public service broadcasting is vulnerable, as it must be as in the days of cutbacks and cable then Radio 3 appears to be the least vulnerable network of all. "It would haved to be pretty funny government and a pretty funny board of governors" that ever dared to touch us," one member of the Radio 3 team declared.

She had a point, the General Staff privately admitted. The area between the German and the British lines had not been well maintained and could do with a bit of a wash and a brush-up. But they weren't prepared for Captain Salmon to organize a series of squads to go out at night and completely reorganize no man's land Craters were filled in, barbed wire cleared away, the whole area re-seeded, until it looked not unlike one of the better municipal parks in Cheltenham.

Trouble is, we're meant to be fighting a war, not redecorating France," said the General Staff, and they sent their youngest member, Colonel Chambers, to talk to her. "My darling," said Colonel Chambers, for he already knew her better than the General Saff suspected, "we are very grateful for all your housework, as it were. But tomorrow night there is to be a general advance, so keep your squads well clear."

There will be no advance over my no man's land!" thundered Drusilla. God, how well khaki suited her hair, thought Chambers. "Tomorrow night my men are putting out white benches and starting on a nine hole pitch 'n' putt

A question of taste

In spite of John the Baptist's example of living on locusts and wild honey, the idea of eating insects has never caught on. Yet there is no doubt that many of them are as nutritious as much of the food we do eat. One problem is collecting together enough insects to make a meal. This does not apply in the case of the silkworm.

China produces about 300,000 tonnes a year of silkworm cocoons. Only half this weight is silk. The remaining 150,000 tonnes of unwanted insect body is discarded. The chrysalides contain about 50 per cent fat, but once this has been removed the remaining material is about 80 per cent protein. Further, it is better quality protein than that obtained from many vegetables. Unfortun-

Another unconventional source of pro-tein which has been arousing scientific interest recently is the guinea pig. This animal, a common pet in the western world, is a native of South America, where it has been used as a meat animal for centuries. In Bolivia and Peru; guinea pigs are still a source of meat in rural communities. Culti-, vation of the guinea plg has been on a similar basis to the tending of domesticated animals in feudal Europe: the animals are treated as members of the household and often live under their owner's bed.

However, it has now been suggested that guinea pigs might be farmed intensively. One advantage is that they will eat almost anything and will convert it effeciently into meat. Secondly, they are prolific, producing up to five litters a year.

Guinea pig pilot farms, in which the animals are kept in concrete pens, have been developed in Peru. However, it would also be possible to keep them in cheaper units, built of adobe. There they could be fed on green vegetables for about three months after weaning in order to reach a marketable weight. At the end of this period, the carcase weight is about three quarters of a pound.

What makes perfect mashed potato? If the advertisements are to be believed, it is powder from a packet.

But this doesn't answer the question properly. Recently, scientists at the Food Research Institute in Norwich have been looking at "home made" mash, to see whether the type of potato used plays a significant part.
They checked masked potato made with different varieties grown at several sites, using different physical tests and correlating these with sensory qualities - mealiness, moisture and structure (coarse or smooth).

The most important factor turned out to be the dry matter weight of the potato, that is the percentage of solids which it contained. This, in turn, depended much less on the variety of poteto used than on where it came from. Different varieties grown at a single site could not be differentiated by the sensory panel, but the further north the potatoes were grown, the smoother the

Nature's 'cures'

In recent years, literally thousands of different substances have been indentified as potential carcinogens. Part of the reason for this been the development of simple tests which check whether substances cause mutations in bacteria and other simple life-forms, and the belief that mutagenicity and carcinogenicity are linked. One of the most famous of these tests is the Ames test, named after its developer, University of California biologist Bruce Ames.

Recently Ames has turned his attention to a question which has cast doubt on the validity of the mutagen carcinogen correlation. That is, if so many substances are carcinogenic. why is cancer not far more prevalent than it actually is? For the Ames and similar tests have not drawn attention only to possible carcinogens among synthetic chemicals. They have found suspect substances in almost every foodstuff. Coffee, for example, may contain carcinogens derived from hurnt material formed during roasting. It also contains a natural mutagen called chlorogenic acid and, of course, caffeine, which can interfere with molecular repair mechanisms. In a recent scientific paper, Ames has listed natural mutagens in pepper, mushrooms, celery, figs, potatoes and broad beans, to name but a few. He points out that many of these substances may have developed during evolution as natural pesticides to protect the plants from insects and fungal predators.

It is believed that many of the carcinogens, if they cause cancer, do so by causing the production of a hyperactive form of oxygen. The anticarcinogens, on the other hand, mop this up and prevent it from damaging living cells. Among the anticarcinogens identified by Ames are vitamins C and E, selenium and carotene. He suggests that, rather than being too concerned about climinating carcinogens from our diet - clearly impossible if there are so many of them - we should concentrate on ensuring an adequate supply of anticarcinogens.

The Boss as PM

Margaret Thatcher Wife, Mother, Politician By Penny Junor (Sidgwick & Jackson, £8.95)

The star scene in this brief, quite intelligent account of the domestic life of our first female Prime Minister concerns Mrs Thatcher and some underbaked potatoes she served for Sunday supper after a meeting of her staff at No 10. She is no diploma performer in the kitchen, and the potatoes were as hard as rocks. Her minions, somewhat cowed by the oc-casion, realizing that this was not a chef one should complain to, went on desperately chewing until she herself discovered the potatoes were uneatable. At which point, did she cheer them up by offering them chicken or a beautiful boeuf stroggnoff next time they came to supper? If that is your assumption you do not know your Prime Minister. She promised them some better baked potatoes the Whence Mrs Thatcher's legendary fixity of purpose? A book of this scope - a 200-word race through the family aneo-dotes with distant thunder signifying politics and power -is hardly likely to provide the total answer to a mystery which civilization as a whole finds pretty baffling. But Penny Junor nakes a very reasonable shot at it, describing rather well the uncompromising outlook en-couraged by Margaret's strict upbringing in Grantham, the details of which, down to the last side of bacon and the cheapest tin of biscnits in her father's corner shop will already be familiar to connoisseurs of the childhoods of the famous, I should like to have heard more of Margaret's maternal grandmother, a Dickensian kind of character who lived with the family throughout her early childhood and whose compulsive mutterings pro industry and cleanliness obviously fell on anything but stony ground.

What is fascinating is the early age at which it struck the future Mrs Thatcher that the things which women like to do in little gaggles - gossip, giggle, compare hair styles, become one another's bridesmaids, leave the men at dinner parties - were not things she enjoyed; nor were they things which she such truths strike us, despondently embark on writing long and complex novels. Another of the options is to make oneself Prime Minister, the most devastating way of saying: "Well, to hell with that."

There have indeed dinner parties at which Denis Thatcher has gone out with the ladies leaving his wife pontifi-cating at the table. Mrs Thatcher as a wife has broken the rules ruthlessly. (How lovely to discover that in real life as in Private Eye she is "The Boss" to Denis.) She has by no means filled the role of the conventional mother, having seldom had the time to spare for playing Snakes and Ladders.

How on earth has Mrs

Thatcher ever got away with it? How has she sustained such a remarkably unorthodox in-terpretation of the role of wife and mother, a concept of freedom beyond the wildest dreams of most female British citizens, within the daunting context of her own position a) of leader of a Cabinet of men who, if not absolute male Chauvinists give one the im-pression of expecting a cleanly laundered shirt put out each morning, and b) as protagonist of a party policy strong on the upholding of traditional values and the sanctity of family?

This book is very pertinent in its analysis of Mrs Thatcher's dual personality. In the house her attributes seem predomi-nantly masculine: firm and unemotional. With her ministegs she shows more female wiles, more sexuality, favouring relationships which border on flirtation. If one of her admirers can really be believed, Mrs Thatcher's Cabinet is a kind of wish fulfilment. Norman Tebbit in the role of her long lost ideal husband, Cecil Parkinson son she wished she'd had".

Mrs Thatcher obviously has a meagre sense of humour. A great part of her success is the absolute conviction with which he binds together her male and female roles. Penny Junor castigates her for her missing sense of humour. But she is wrong to do so. Her solemnity is crucial. Take that gravity away and the Prime Minister collapses. A funny Mrs Thatcher is a terrifying thought.

Born in Breslau in 1885, Klemperer was a manic-depressive Jew of abnormal height, who turned Catholic not, like Mahler, for pro-fessional reasons, but because he found Christianity intellectually attractive. When manic, he conducted Tannhauser with his feet on the desk, composed, womanized and compelled lyric sopranos to tackle unsuitable roles at his command. In depression, he tore up his works, and disappeared into sanitoria for weeks or months on end, restoring his calm and studying scores. As an artist, Heyworth points out, he stood between two worlds: he was both Mahlerian expressionist and Stravinskian neo-classicist, earning the warm admiration of Trotsky in Moscow and of Oberbürgermeister Adenaper in Cologne.

Music critics are not noted for an expressive grasp of political realities - in this country, they generally do not need one - so the first thing to welcome in Otto Klemperer is Peter Heyworth's wide reading and comprehension of political developments in Germany and Soviet Russia between the Bolshevik Revolution and the advent of the Third Reich, I am not yet convinced that more than 200 pages are required to write about Klemperer's early years in Hamburg, Prague, Wiesbaden and Cologne before America? Famous novels between hardish covers for £5

A hardback novel costs about the same as a bottle of whisky; as it did ten, 20, and 50 years ago. And the pleasure is less ephemeral. This does not stop the whingeing and thirsty classes from complaining about the price of novels. To compete with trade paperback competition, fibrary cuts, and the distillers, Heinemann today reinvent the hardback by introducing a new juspint called Landmark. The first eight titles of famous literary works of the twentieth century are: Death in Venice and Other Stories, by Thomas Mann; The Grapes of Wrath, by John Steinbeck; A Town Like Alice, by Nevil Shate; Brighton Rock, by Graham Greene; Sons and Lovers, by D. H. Lawrence; The Trial and Metamorphosis, by Franz Kafka; The Day of the Locust, by Nathaniel West; and To Kill a Mockingbird, by Harper Lee. Each has a fairly hard cover in four colours, and breaks the magic burrier of £5 by being for sale at £4.95. You need a backlist as long and strong as those of Heinemann and Socker & Warburg for such a project. They intend eventually to republish about 600 of their titles as Landmarks. Sadly the printing is being done in Finland; it would have cost three times as much to print in Great Britain.

Crime Of trust and betrayal

(Hutchinson, £8.95)

So Deighton hasn't been shortlisted for the Booker. I haven't yet read the novels that were, but they'll need to be pretty damn good to equal the writing here. And, though this story of an agent, his write in the business, and an old debt of honour to be paid on the far side of the Curtain is rich in splendidly telling phrases ("the sort of compressed permanent wave that fitted like a rubber swimming hat") and pointedly sharp descriptions ("being in the process of writing a report was the nearest that Dicky ever came to admitting total ignor-ance"), it is not these one-liners that put it so high. It is the sheer consistent rightness page after page after page.

It is this that gives one as one reads the book, for all its dealing with uneverday life, the feeling that it did all actually happen. The words which the characters (the people, rather) say to each other are not those that came most readily to hand they are the fruit of concentrated effort (did you know that a Berliner is a sort of dough-nut?) used not to impress but to get things absolutely right.

This in itself would not have made me think Booker were it not that such writing is used to explore a major human concern (unless it had been, the words could hardly have reached such could hardly have reached such intensity), the theme of be-trayal. From the very opening scene, as two men contemplate the Wall they have been wedded to for almost 25 years, on to the hero's final sickening certainty the notion vibrates in the mind Nor is it treated at its most obvious always. We see more than once the betrayed as half willing his betrayal. "Nothing here is what it seems," the hero thinks looking at the buildings of Berlin's hollow heart, "and that appeals to me." And it is his despised jumped-over-him boss who bleats later, with slowfuse irony, "Sometimes things are what they appear to be." So trust and betrayal, those two poles that exist in us all, are investigated up and down, through and through, and one lays down the book exclaiming "Oh, brave old world that has such writers in it."

IN INDUSTRY

Scotland

There is growing optimism north of the border. Much patient work and investment in restructuring the economy are producing results

It was once a tradition that Scotland fared worse than England in recession and that England's chill turned to pneumonia by the time it reached the ailing, heavy industries of west central Scotland. That tradition is gone and the strongest optimism now lies north of the border.

Scottish heavy industry remains critically vulnerable in most sectors but the threat that still stalks the shipyards of the Clyde, the steel mills of Lanarkshire, and the coal mines of central Scotland, has been countered by positive action in the direction of new industry. Years of patient work and investment have gone into restructuring the Scottish economy and are at last bearing, results. At the same time, the oil industry is reflecting longer-term benefits through the developed expertise that can be applied outside the North Sea.

To an outsider it is also strikingly apparent that Scotland benefits enormously by comparision with similarly hard-hit industrial areas in England in having a government structure that is strong autonomous. Scotland, with a population of fewer than six million, has a minister in the government, a development agency with strong financial teeth and a powerful sense of By government direction and incentive it has received a lion's share of the electronics industry and overseas investment, and a flock of impressively successful produced its own lucrative spin-Aberdeen. Scottish economic planners are somewhat relieved that at least for the present the drain of jobs has slowed, although it is clear that traditional industry could still suffer catastrophic job losses. The SNP - the vehicle for the expression of much pent-up frustration against both Labour and Conservative governments in the 1970s - is a shadow of its old self. For the last two years it has used up a lot of its formidable political energy in internal fighting. Its leader, Mr Gordon Wilson, MP for Dundee East, attempted to bring unity to his party at the annual conference in Rothesay at the beginning of the month and to give it a more acceptable political image, but was only partially successful.

From the heady days of climbing mass membership and opposition. There were no riots brimming coffers, delegates

The SNP is estimated to have only a quarter of the membership it had in the mid-1970s when the figure topped 80,000 The deficit is reckoned to be £25,000 and rising.

If the nationalists are not causing Mr Younger to lose any sleep, he cannot yet have had many bad nights as a result of Labour opposition, despite the brave words on election night of Mr George Foulkes, MP for Carrick, Cannock and Doune Valley, to make the job of secretary of state untenable.

The Scottish Parliamentary Labour Party is unlikely to give wholehearted support to a battle to gain devolution which undermines the constitutional authority of Parlament at Westminster as part of its tactics. That would smack too much of tactics that might be employed by the nationalists.

The Labour Party conference in Brighton pledged support for a Scottish legislative assembly but said it would not work with other political parties to achieve it. For the moment that looks like empty rhetoric.

Maxim's big guns

Pierre Cardin launched Maxim's London season with an ostentatious "private" dinner party last night which obliged the restaurant to insure its cloakroom for £1m. Guests included Princess Fizyal of Jordan, Prince Adyn Aga Khan, the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough, Baron Edouard de Rothschild, and Lord and Lady Spencer Churchill. With Faye Dunaway, Charlotte Rampling and Mark Thatcher among those on the lower tables, the 180 guests were treated to a naphand of traditional haute cuisine by chef Christian-Paul Moury.

The most famous restaurant in the world opened its London premises informally in July, after negotiations between Cardin, its owner for the past five years, and the British catering concern Kennedy Brookes. While the rest of last night's guests arrived by Rolls-Royce, the 61-year-old French fashion designer opted for delivery in a refurbished 1920s Maxim's van.

Acid warning

"Could the next five years turn sour?" was the appetizing title given to the talk by the Cabinet's arch pessimist, John Biffen, to the National Association of Conservative Graduates in Blackpool yesterday. Remembering the Leader of the Commons' headline-winning warnings in the past of years of austerity ahead, the media turned out in force and helped pack a small, airless room in the basement of the Claremont Hotel. Biffen appeared surprised by the interest and immediately sought to dampen expectations when he opened his remarks by quoting Groucho Marx:

Unseemly conduct

Klemperer's declining an invitation to conduct Lohengrin in Hamburg in 1966 is revealed today in Peter Hayworth's biography of the manicdepressive conductor. Klemperer's previous Hamburg Lohengrin, more than 50 years earlier, had ended in uproar when the conductor was struck across the face with a riding crop during the coda of the final chorus by the husband of his prima donna, Elisabeth Schumann. Klemperer clambered out of the orchestra pit into which he had been propelled by the blows and was separated from his assailant only by a pastor who claimed to be a friend of the family. The conductor then dusted himself off and explained to the astonished audience that "Herr Puritz has attacked me because I love his wife. Good evening". The matter ended peaceably, however, with a state-

Policies failing, prospects grave

The reason why the welfare state and other Tory objectives and achievements are under threat can be given in one word: monetarism. You may think that in talking about monetarism I am indulging in intellectual archaeology. Monetarism, that once all-popular word, has now, after all, virtually disappeared

But even if monetarism has lost its name and is decidedly punchdrunk, the dogma is still there. No, that is not quite right. The dogma has retreated into the shadows, shorn of much of its theoretical basis and support; but the dogmatism is as strong as ever.

A government that won't pay to put people to work soon finds that it has serious difficulties paying for them to go to hospital or school or even to be defended from enemies abroad and criminals at home. If we are not careful it won't even be anarchy plus the constable - we shan't be able to afford the talking about laying foundations. Clearly, however, there has been some rise in production since the lowest point of 1981. But one is not entitled to certify that there has been recovery unless national production is rising faster than the national capacity to produce.

Unfortunately, by that criterion, there has not been a recovery. That is demonstrated by the fact that unemployment, which rose by more than 14 million in the three years from 1979 to September 1982, has since risen by a quarter of a million. We all know that employment takes time to respond to changes in demand, and that unemployment is now increasing more slowly. Nevertheless, the rate of increase over the past year is still high by historic standards, and when we remember the poverty and hardship associated

The focus of international interest

Sir Ian Gilmour argues that although monetarism has been discredited, its lingering effects will damage the economy for years to come

ter of a million people on the dole in the existing level of economic a year invites the conclusion that we are still going the wrong way even if less fast than we were before.

The growth that we have had has been caused not by changed attitudes, higher productivity, any new mood of realism or acceptance of lower real wages, or any other of the current catch phrases. It has been caused quite simply, like every other rise in output in postwar Britain, by an expansion of demand.

This little expansion, far from laying the foundations for sustained growth, has coincided with a serious weakening of the economy. Thus between 1981 and the first half of 1983 the current balance of payments deteriorated in a deeply alarming way. The overall deterioration was about £5½ billion; but over the same period the oil balance improved by over £3bn. So in less than two years the non-oil balance has deteriorated by nearly £9bn.

Those are horrendous figures. The necessary alternative to monetarism can be simply stated: a policy of sustained expansion of a kind that is neither inflationary on the one hand nor damaging to the balance of payments on the other.

A surprisingly large number of people, including many well to the left of the Tory tradition, now believe that such a reflation is a contradiction in terms. The monetarists have persuaded them that the higher government spending and borrowing and the lower interest rates that reflation implies would necessarily put up prices and would necessarily damage our international trade. Fortunately this is wholly

The outcome of any particular reflationary programme will always depend on two things. First, on the scale of the reflation in relation to

Edward Mortimer on the plight of a people from whom hope has fled

activity; second, on the purposes to which the additional resources pumped into the economy are put. As for the scale of any reflation in the UK in the immediate future, there is a need for great caution. Our economy is so debilitated by bankruptcies and by the reduction of capital investment that even at our present very low levels of economic activity we have rising inflation, and for the first time in our history, a deficit in manufactured trade. In these circumstances, reflation, even if it is accompanied by appropriate measures, will achieve only a limited increase in growth.

There are four things which the Government should do to ensure that reflation entails the optimum allocation of new resources:

 It should reduce industrial costs by abolishing the national insurance surcharge, by reducing industry's ordinary national insurance contributions and by restraining, not increasing, the energy costs imposed on industry by the public utilities.

 It should ensure that in its own increases in expenditure there is an appropriate balance between capital and current spending. And to make sure the most useful capital projects are selected it must be careful to choose them only after particular consultation with the private sector, in particular within the framework NEDO and the EDCs. There should be no ideological nonsense about being unwilling to enter discussions of this kind because of their "corporatist" implications.

incomes policy covering both the private and public sector.

Very much more could be done if our reflation could be coordinated with that of other countries. The United States provides an instructive example. There the prophet Friedman is scorned in his own land. In the US there is unquestionably a strong recovery, and unemployment is coming down. New supply side is but old demand side writ large. While Britain is still obsessed with the PSBR, the Americans run an enormous deficit and the economy booms.

Britain and the partners in the European Community will be crazy if they do not take advantage of developments across the Atlantic and embark on a common programme of recovery. But if the Government, unlike the Reagan administration, rejects expansion and remains wedded to Friedman, monetarism and the Medium Term Financial Strategy, we are entitled to ask some questions.

First, after successfully winning two elections the Government is more than ever pledged to getting the economy right, so has it any idea when this might actually happen?

Second is the Government prepared to admit that any level of unemployment is intolerable? And by "intolerable" I don't just mean saying that it is intolerable and then proceeding to tolerate it as did Michael Foot when he was Employment Secretary.

Third, can the Government tell us what, on present economic policies, will be better in four years time? Will inflation be lower? Will growth be much higher? Will there be more jobs? Will there be higher standards in schools? Better health care? What will be better?

I doubt if there could be reassuring answers to these questions. The outlook is grave.

The real message from Blackpool conference agenda were sufficient sign of a political party's internal health and happiness, the Conserva-tive Party, from the Cabinet to the least of its constituency representatives, would have reason for selfcongratulation. The first day at Blacknool was dominated by the principal subject on which the Government has something new to say - the Home Secretary's announcement of what is tantamount to a heavier penal code for violent crime, coupled with an attempt to remove from the prisons lesser offenders. Leon Brittan's announcement has aroused some spiteful and hysterical attacks from the liberal press on the ground that if there is a retributive assument for long sentences, and given that some dangerous men have to be put away to protect the public, increasing the length of the sentence is not a deterrent, and is unimportant compared with detection.

On that argument, one might ask whether any term of imprisonment deters, and whether it might not be enough to detect the criminal and set him free. But the Home Secretary can be confident of public support, and the party managers have particular cause to be glad that they selected this subject for the first day in view of the general uneasiness that underlies this conference.

The smoothness of the conference's proceedings was also well served by the way in which local government was discussed. Representatives concerned with local government are worried primarily by what they regard as the increasingly centralist tendencies of the Government as evidenced by its rate-capping plan. They even fear that the abolition of the GLC and metropolitan councils could ultimately have wider significance. Yet what was actually before them was a motion urging the Government to change the rating system to make it fairer - which simply gave Patrick Jenkin, Environment Secretary, the chance to repeat what everybody already knew - that the rating system is here to stay for lack of an acceptable alternative, High rates, he told the conference, were simply the fault of extremist local authorities which pushed their spending and their rates to a point which leaves the Government no alternative but to impose ceilings.

Even so, many Conservatives in local government are now so fearful of centralism that they freely ask whether there is much future in local government if it loses all power over the rate it can levy. There is real uneasiness about the survival of the Tory tradition of local responsibility.

Still more important, the conference had no specific discussion on future public spending, although it figured in general terms in yester-day's debate on the economy. Public spending is at the heart of the Government's present dilemma in its relations with the electorate. The difficulty arises from the refusal to publish a year ago the leaked Treasury forecast that the longerterm cost of the welfare state was well beyond what the nation could afford without steeply rising prices. Nobody knows how far this analysis (now contradicted by the Institute of Fiscal Studies) is correct, but the failure to have a full discussion on public spending of all kinds before the election has helped to wrongfoot the Government.

doctors and nurses than ever. Since its memory.

imposed manpower restrictions on the NHS leading to the dismissal of doctors and nurses and is driven to argue that its latest cuts are not cuts because the manpower reductions are simply to keep within the existing spending targets.

The logic is, to say the least, shaky. The Government has been forced into this position because the demands of the open-ended, demand-controlled general practitioner service can be made good only by cash limits in the hospital sector. The Government's dilemma is a real one, but it has become vulnerable to the charge that it did not play sufficiently straight with the public, that after a fairly generous pre-election budget it has had to claw back money in the current year, that next year it will be driven to cuts to keep cash targets; and that the long-term need to take the public along with reshaping the welfare state has been obscured by ill-organized and ill-presented shortterm candle-end economies.

The confusion in the argument over public spending, affecting as it does welfare services on which vast numbers of people rely, is potentially damaging to the Government. Unemployment is no less so and beneath the surface many Conservatives recognize the potential threat of Neil Kinnock's more affable face of socialism, if his party lets him present it. The Government has allowed the impression to grow that it is so mechanistically concerned with the control of money and public spending, and yet so uncer-tain how to achieve the latter, that it cannot bring itself to express proper concern for the future of unemployment in the age of the microchip, nor plan to deal with it.

Mrs Thatcher's success was built on her reputation for telling the people the truth fully and clearly. That reputation has recently been endangered, and the Government is also seen as being insufficiently concerned with some of the social problems that are the by-product of its politics. This matters because elections are won and lost not simply by a Government's performance just beforehand but on the public's memory of its behaviour over the previous five years.

It is never easy to explain satisfactorily government's apparent loss of touch, and it is equally difficult to assess how far the appearance reflects reality. There ems to have been a certain lack of sensitive direction at the top of this Government recently. The Prime Minister has given the impression that she takes the electorate for granted, and is so enwrapped in her own current certainties that she does not need to look farther ahead, nor to explain herself.

The unhappy business of Cecil Parkinson's private life has been a further blow to the Conservative Party. Though there is at all levels a dispostion to rally round his decision to stay, some in the Cabinet believe that the unseemliness is made it impossible for the Tories to hammer away at the theme of family values. Certainly, it has added to the uncertainties beneath the exterior of party unity.

When the Conservatives go back to Parliament, they must rediscover how to conduct their relations with For example, before the election the public. Theatre, watching the intricate manoeuvres of harried thespians, sardines, bedroom doors, whisky bottles, contact lenses, flightbags, axes and all the other paraphernalia of Michael Frayn's farcical study the joys of repertory acting, Noises Off. Friday night, I saw the play again. Yes, there was Mrs Clackett, the housekeeper of character opens Act One of the dim-witted farce seen in frantic rehearsal at the Grand Theatre, Weston-super-Mare. There were the characteristic slippers, the headscarf, the hearty pair of socks. But what had happened to the dialogue? On Monday she had muttered: "I can't open the sardines and answer the phone!" Now she seemed to say: "Eg get ekki opnad sardinudos og svarad i simann samtimis". I was watching a performance in Icelandic, at the National Theatre in Reykjavik.

So far, so good: sardines, being fish, seemed an appropriate loclandic prop, even if they were spelt differently. But as the evening - and the laughter - continued, I grew to realize the subtle transformations necessary to kit Noises Off for its journey towards the Arctic circle; to become, in fact, Skvaldur (or babble): Place names, for instance. lcelanders know many parts of Britain, from the Regent Palace Hotel onwards, but Weston-super-Mare, Goole, Yeovil, Basingstoke, Worksop and Stockton-on-Tees are not generally among them.

The opening rehearsal, then, was switched from Weston-super-Mare to Hastings, familiar to the chess-mad Icelanders for its chess tournaments. Stockton-on-Tees, home of Act. Three, became Grimsby - known, if not loved, as a fisherman's port of call. Income tax offices were fiendishly transferred from meaningless Basingstoke to meaningful Watford, home of a familiar football team. To those whose knowledge of Icelandic was artistic director of the Reykjavik limited to "No", "Yes", "Thank City Theatre, she doubtless knew you" and "Thank you very much", that actors, human idiocy, and Alan Franks | selcome, changed or not; they were, world over.

Monday night, I was at the Savoy still known points among furiously turning syllables.

But there were other odder hurdles to be jumped by the play's intrepid director, Jill Brooke, and her resourceful translator, Ami Ibsen, the theatre's dramature. The characters in Michael Frayn's play are performing a trouser-dropping farce called Nothing On; in Iceland's austere climate, however, only an idiot would have nothing on. Farce itself clashes with the Scandinavian fondness for searing gloom, especially at the Reykjavik National Theatre, a forbidding structure known to intimates as "the temple". Most of the comedies staged in Iceland are foreign imports; few have been successful without heavy Furthermore, the country's modest population (at 232,000 people, locland is smaller than Plymouth) has never experienced the full torture of weekly rep, when both play and performer deteriorate as the dismal itinerary advances. What price, then, Frayn's line "We were in weekly rep together in Peebles?" In fact, it was a fair exchange: "Vid vorum saman I leikfelaginu. . i Felixstowe" - where cargo ships dock. The translator snared further exotic phrases in the burglar's line "It's time to hang up the sawn-off shotgun . . . It's time to let a younger man take over the ammonia bottle." As violent crime in Iceland is still in its infancy and the Reykjavík jail a quaint tourist sight, the burglar had to be content with hanging up his jemmy and relinquishing his wrench.

Yet in the last resort, the language made little difference; it was only the traditional stiffness of first-night trepidition that kept some laughter back. Iceland's president, Vigdis-Finnbogadottir, showed no restraint herself she was observed in her box rocking backwards and forwards, wiping away tears. An Orwell surprise for 1984

Nincteen eighty-four will see the last full-scale work, had become publication in facsimile of part of the original manuscript of George Orwell's prophetic novel.

In Britain, Secker and Warburg, who first published the book 34 years ago, will publish a reproduction of the surviving 180-odd pages, in conjunction with M & S Press, the American owners of the imprint of the manuscript. Part is in Orwell's handwriting, part typed. Harcourt Brace Jovanovic, with

M & S, will publish in America. The manuscript, which comprises about half the book, has been in the bands of the American book dealer Daniel Siegel since 1969, when he bought it from the now defunct rare books department of Scriveners. It provides graphic evidence of the way in which Orwell, towards the end of his life and engaged on his meticulous in his revision.

Although Secker and Warburg, who are executors of the Orwell estate in London, had long been aware of its existence, they and Siegel had assumed, until this year, that the other considered it to be of only limited interest. Apart from them, only members of remote academic circles had known of its whereshouts.

The pages, now insured for $250,000 (about £166,000), show how Orwell, at the time in the throes of terminal tuberculosis, reworked his prose endlessly to achieve the novel's tightly pared style. They also contain potentially shocking references (notably one to a negress giving birth on the gallows), which were later expunged. Though it is pages are hand-written and not typed, the probable reason is that Orwell was confined to bed when he wrote them.

How the manuscript came to survive in this truncated form is also a mystery, in view of the fact that Orwell usually destroyed his own drafts. What is known is that soon after Orwell's death in 1950 his widow Sonia passed it via the English bibliographer John Carter to Scriveners for a charity auction. Siegel's view is that it may then have remained with a collector for 17 years until its resale to Scriveners and his own subsequent acquisition of it for an undisclosed figure.

Professor Peter Davison, who is editing an expanded collection of Orwell's writings, and Tom Rosenthal, chairman of Secker and Warburg, were both surprised when film transcript in the Orwell archives at London University, the exact contents of the surviving manuscript, and Rosenthall flew at once to the US to negotiate publishing terms with Siegel.

Davison believes there will be particularly keen interest among American teachers and students. Orwell's work is widely used in the US in readers to aid composition, and the manuscript, he says, will prove of great value in the art of writing taut English.

In Rosenthal's words, the manuscript offers "a unique insight into the creative process, and is of inestimable value simply because Nineteen Eighty-Four is among the most widely read works of twentieth century literature."

THE CHANCELLOR'S GOAL

In his speech to the Conservative party conference yesterday Mr Lawson was scornful of the Government's many critics who said four years ago that its economic programme was "politically impossible". He clearly feels that the election result shows sound financial policies to be not only politically possible, but even politically successful.

But is the Government's second term to be just a holding operation or is it to see further progress towards a sound currency? Are inflation and the budget deficit to be stabilised at current levels or does the Government intend to eliminate both completely? At points in his speech Mr Lawson indicated that, in his view, there is more to be done. In particular, he made the emphatic and important statement that "the surest foundation for new jobs is stable prices". This does not constitute an outright commitment to restore price stability, but it is rather more than a preliminary expression of interest in the idea. So habituated have people become to rising prices that the goal of price stability might seem almost outside the bounds of the economically imaginable, let alone the politically possible. But Mr Lawson's reminder of how quickly attitudes have shifted on other aspects of policy suggests that public opinion can be moulded in the right direction. His task - and, indeed, that of other senior ministers - is to ease the restoration of price stability by making it quite clear that this is the ultimate objective of the Government's anti-inflationary effort

The immediate prospect is not particularly good. It seems almost certain that, when the September retail price index is announced on Friday, the twelve-month increase will exceed 5 per cent. The news will no doubt be accompanied by headlines about "higher inflation" which will have some unfavourable impact on this year's pay round.

But there is no need for great concern. Arguably, the context for wage bargaining over the next few months has already been set by the Vauxhall workers' 7 1/2 per cent deal and the miners' probable acceptance of the National Coal Board's 5.2 per cent offer. The majority of settlements should be in the 5 per cent to 6 per cent range, a little less than in the previous round. If productivity growth continues at its recent rate, the underlying increase in industry's costs will moderate further and the numerous forecasts of 7 per cent inflation by the end of 1984 may prove too pessimistic.

More fundamentally, the climate of expectations is more helpful today than four years ago. In 1979 price stability was so remote as to be almost laughable as a policy aim. Indeed, the peak inflation rate recorded under Mrs. Thatcher was over 22 per cent in early 1981. Even if they are rising a little, expectations now are much lower. It is reasonable to ask why reducing inflation from 5 per cent to nil should be so difficult if the rate has already been cut from over 20 per cent to about 5 per cent.

Sceptics may claim that the eradication of inflation will require still more unemployment. This remains to be seen. Mr Lawson pointed out in his speech that employment has started to rise again and that the relatively modest unemployment increase still being recorded reflects growth in the labour force. He might also have said that the original rationale for the Government's approach is that, in the long run, there is no tradeoff between inflation and unemployment. Perhaps his remark that "the surest foundation for new jobs is stable prices" could be regarded as a pithy and popularised version of this

The Government's critics are undoubtedly on the defensive. In his speech at Blackpool, condensed on the opposite page. Sir Ian Gilmour tried desperately to pin some derogatory label on official policies and managed to come up with "monetarist" and "sound money". Of course, he is right. Official policies are both monetarist and concerned with sound money. So what?

Labels in themselves do not matter one jot. Mr Lawson will be judged by the economy's performance not by his doctrinal purity. But to say this is not to imply that policy should oscillate from week to week without welldefined guidelines. Sir Geoffrey Howe's guidelines were set by the medium-term financial strategy. Mr Lawson's should be determined by the recognition of price stability as a goal to be attained within the lifetime of this parliament.

PRIVATE LINE OR PARTY LINE?

Like political crime, political services. It is therefore most industrial action is a concept which depends crucially on definition. Any strike in the public sector, against an emplayer more or less obliged to implement official policy, has an implicit political dimension: that is one reason why it is desirable to limit the areas of employment where that ambiguous position prevails. There is no definition of political action in law, only a definition of the kind of action which can claim immunity against civil suits. The most recent of many revisions of it is in the Employment Act 1982, and it is as yet viriually untouched by being put to use in the courts.

The dispute over privatization at British Telecom, which the Post Office Engineering Union extended yesterday, qualifies as political by almost any criteria. It is not directed against the employer, who plainly has no power whatever to give the guarantees that are sought about what will happen when he ceases to be their employer. It is against the Government, and a third party. Mercury, created by the Government to impart a (rather notional) element of competition the POEU leaders hope that their into our telecommunications members are so strategically unlikely that a court would find that the action qualified for the legal immunities. The official policy that the union is campaigning against is not simply policy in a general sense: it was outlined in detail in the manifesto on the strength of which the Conservatives were re-elected could hardly be fresher or more issue is not political, but closely related to their terms and conditions of employment. The union, a moderate one until the present dispute brought leftwingers into control, has opposed privatization from the start, partly from genuine conviction that telecommunications need to be run as a monopoly public service, and partly from the not unjustified fear that if the change comes about its members will be left worse off (an industrial relations response, but one where it happens that no appropriate legal adversary exists as yet).

Regardless of politics and law, placed in the communications network that they can enforce their will even though they are only part of the workforce. Even today, no prudent government would embark on a major act of privatization without taking account of the possibility of such resistance, and its prospects of success. The union is extending four months ago. A mandate the dispute on terms which ensure that a major clash would be ruinously expensive to the Yet in the eyes of many in the union in strike pay. There are union, divided themselves about already signs that morale in the the wisdom of the action, the union is affected by those political factors, the manifesto and the 1982 Act. There is a ossibility that Mercury ma bring a civil action against the union. If the action was successful, the union's only hope would be to draw the trade union movement into a national confrontation with the government, and the TUC plainly has all too little spirit at present for such a thing. The leaders of the union are making a dangerous gamble in taking a course which can scarcely succeed unless it provokes a constitutional crisis in which they would hope that the government could be brought to its knees by the TUC. All recent evidence points to the opposite. They should call it off.

TOO MUCH OF A SHADOW SHOGUN

He has been variously described as the shadow Shogun, the kingmaker and the eminence denouement of the Tanaka grise of Japanese politics. What- drama. But in fact it is not yet ever he may be called, Mr Kakuei Tanaka is still the most powerful and most extraordinary figure in Japanese politics today. A crude, abrasive figure, by the conventional standards of Japanese politics, he worked his way up to the post of Prime Minister in 1972 and thereafter achieved an influence in the ruling Liberal Democratic Party unrivalled by any other faction leader. He has wielded this influence ever since, in spite of the scandals that erupted around him - the financial scandal which led to his resignation as prime minister in 1974 and the Lockheed bribery scandal two

When Mr Tanaka was accused of taking a massive bribe from the Lockheed Corporation, the affair was seen as Japan's own Watergate. As in the case of President Nixon, opinion about Mr Tanaka was divided between those who thought he was at last getting his come uppance and those who saw him as being unfairly victimised by a jealous establishment. Unlike Mr Nixon, Mr Tanaka was eventually brought to trial.

In Japan the wheels of justice grind slowly, and only now has he been found guilty of the bribery charge against him. Outside observers would be forgiven for regarding the four the end of the story.

Although Mr Tanaka is no longer a member of the Liberal Democratic Party, he still sits in the Japanese Parliament as an Independent, and his faction is still the largest single faction in the cabinet of the present prime minister, Mr Yasuhiro Nakasone. Indeed, Mr Nakasone owes his present position largely to the behind the scenes support of Mr Tanaka, and ever since he took office last November, the Tanaka affair has been regarded as the single most difficult issue he would have to deal with.

The reason for this has more to do with the labyrinthine internal politics of the ruling Liberal Democrats than with the political opposition in Japan, or with the attitude of the Japanese public. The Japanese public is on the whole inured to the fact that its political leaders work closely, sometimes too closely, with money and business. And while the opposition parties will demand Mr Tanaka's resignation from Parliament, they are divided and poorly represented there, so their views will probably not carry much weight. Within his Liberal Democratic Party, on the other hand, Mr Nakasone retains his hold on power thanks only to a careful balancing act among the various problem of how to distance himself from Mr Tanaka without losing his support, but sufficiently to satisfy those other faction leaders who have long been hoping for Mr Tanaka's political demise.

During the past few years there has been some uneasiness in Tokyo at the way that the Liberal Democrats conduct their internal affairs. This feeling stems partly from the belief that Japan's political machinery, based as it is on practices that go back to pre-capitalist days, no longer meets the needs of a modern, highly industrialised state. Doubtless there is little hope of Japan's factional politics being superseded, at least for the foreseeable future. But now that the Tanaka trial is over Mr Nakasone and his colleagues could at least make a gesture in the right direction by avoiding a fresh bout of factional infighting. During the past 11 months Mr Nakasone has made great headway, in particular in his dealings with his Western allies, and this is no time for him to be distracted from his efforts. As for Mr Tanaka, he would do well to take the cue of yesterday's verdict and retire altogether from parliamentary and political life. The signs are that he does not intend to do any such thing: but the fact is that there are limits which politicians in his position should not go beyond, and he has clearly gone beyond

Health Service and private general practice, which has been declining for 35 years, will start the explosive growth recently experienced by private hospitals, BUPA member-

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Citizens of no mean city

From Mr B. J. Goodchild Sir. Mr Patrick Jenkin's White Paper totally ignores the concept of London as a geographical, historical and social entity.

I believe that the average London citizen thinks in terms of London more often than of his local borough. He is far more likely to describe himself as a Londoner than a man of Brent. He may live in the suburbs but be keenly interested in what goes on in the West End.

He does not want transport or other systems which stop short at meaningless boundaries, nor does he care that in travelling from Oxford Circus to Holborn he is passing from Westminster into Camden.

I find it inconceivable that a capital city in which many still take pride should be without its own elected council. Yours faithfully, B. J. GOODCHILD, 15 Wesson House, Ashburton Road, Croydon, Surrey. October 8.

British bloodstock

From the Chairman of The National Council on Gambling

Sir, In your leading article on the bloodstock industry (October 1), you state that racing "last year provided £272m in revenue for the Exchequer, of which less than £19m was returned through the levy". This is not so.

The facts are that the money which the industry receives from the horserace betting levy is obtained from the punter and not the Exchequer. Whatever the Revenue might or might not be persuaded to do to support the racing industry, the punter is already obliged to do so through the levy. Furthermore, the contribution of the punter constitutes hypothecation, which ensures a subsidy to racing in a manner certainly not available to industry generally. It is, of course, argued that without a racing industry there would be no betting and thus it is in the punter's interest to subsidise racing. Indeed the argument is even extended to imply that the profits from horserace betting really belong to the racing industry. However, this is as rational an argument as to suggest that the proceeds from betting on the outcome of a leadership contest in a particular political party belong to that party. Clearly, the proceeds from gambling of any type belong to the punter and the gambling industry concerned and should rightly be shared by them, subject to the right of the Revenue to impose taxes. While most punters now probably accept the levy as an integral part of their gambling expenses, it is important that its true basis should be recognized. Yours faithfully.

Cenotaph ceremony

From Mr Hubert Chesshyre, Chester

Sir, Captain Eric Lowden, writing of the Cenotaph ceremony (Oct 7), comments on the fact that the representatives of the armed services come last in the procession of wreath bearers.

If it is of any comfort I should like to remind them that in many ceremonial processions in this country, whether civil or religious, the most important people walk at the end.

If further comfort is needed, they should remember that in the world to come "many that are first shall be last, and the last first". Yours truly, HUBERT CHESSHYRE,

Church membership

From Dr Roger Homan Sir, Between the lines of Brother Martin's letter on Church membership and the new forms of service (September 28) there is an ominous acceptance of the disaffection suffered by those many of the faithful upon whom the Alternative Service Book has been imposed.

Not only has ASB failed to attract new members to the Church, it has even lost many of the old. The survey conducted by me in the archdeaconry of Chichester showed clear correlations between electoral roll memberships and changes in the forms of service: between 1975 and 1980 those parishes changing to Series 3, the most modern form then available, suffered the greatest losses, whereas those persisting with the Book of Common Prayer or with Series 2 held their own or enjoyed slight increases in membership.

Brother Martin reminds us that Canon Jasper, of York, is sanguine in the face of such losses. Canon Dunlop, of Salisbury, has gone further in actually welcoming the prospect of smaller congregations: "There is such a thing as dead wood in a congregation," he writes in the Church Times. "It would sometimes be better to have a smaller number of really committed Christians than somewhat larger clientele."

The modern services, it is clear, are designed not for a nation's Church but for an introspective and exclusive sect; and their champions are hastening the day when the Church of England takes on that character. Yours faithfully, ROGER HOMAN, Wistaria Cottage, Maresfield, East Sussex. September 29.

The human face of Conservatism

المراجع المراعع المراجع المراجع المراجع المراجع المراجع المراجع المراجع المراع

From Lord Renton, QC

Sir, After their big defeat in the general election, it is not surprising that the Labour Party should make strenuous attacks on the Prime Minister who, more than anyone, caused that defeat. In doing so they stop at nothing:

for example, they vehemently criticise the overall reduction by less than one per cent of the huge National Health Service staffs, which increased by 200,000 between 1971 and 1981, and now exceed 815,000. This is said by Socialists to reveal a lack of concern on her part. What is surprising, however, is that an experienced Tory like Lord

Alport (October 6) should accuse her in sweeping terms, contrary to the evidence. Her deep concern for individual sufferers is well known. When she was Secretary of State for Education she at once introduced the Education (Handicapped Children) Act. 1970, and in the last Parliament, under her guidance and with the support of all parties, two more Education Acts and the Mental Health Acts between them gave new hope for mentally handicapped people. The Government are giving some help to get mentally handicapped children out of unsuitable long-stay hospitals. More is now being spent in real terms on the welfare state than ever before, but it is vital to ensure that progress achieved is not reversed by inflation, whether caused by overspending or by unjustified rises in incomes.

If the Prime Minister did not make that plain to those who disagree with her, she would indeed be guilty of what Lord Alport calls

"a lack of sympathy for those for whom the welfare state...pro-vides." But thank goodness, she does speak plainly and robustly and in defence of the welfare state. If some people can't take it, she should not be condemned.

Moral values in the Parkinson affair

From Mrs Patricia Coady Sir, It seems (The Times, October 11) that if you have committed an "indiscretion" you may be Secretary of State for Trade and Industry but not Foreign Secretary or Chairman of the Conservative Party.

Is this an indication of a standards?

industry? Or both?

Yours faithfully,

From Mr John H. Gladwin Sir, I refer to your leader of October

May I answer your question as to why the public expects its leaders to preserve the outward forms of a morality which, you claim, it no longer practises. It is simply because we do expect our leaders to demonstrate by example - a fundamental of leadership - the high moral standards to which, I pray, the majority of us do, and will continue to, aspire.

Yours faithfully. JOHN H. GLADWIN. Normanhurst. Warwick Road, Bishop's Stortford, Hertfordshire. October 7

From Dr G. D. Wassermann Sir. As a Tory voter I have been deeply impressed by the present generous public attitude towards one of the greatest British statesmen ever, David Lloyd George. His longlasting affair with his mistress, during his marriage, did not seriously belittle the status of this liberal political giant.

Only recently the BBC serialized his life on TV, including his private affair, and repeated the series, presumably because of public acclaim for true greatness. So why

Financing pensions From Mr F. W. Bowden

Sir, Many aspects of the naivete of Messrs Vinson's and Chappell's proposals (September 28) to reorganise occupational pension provision in this country have been pointed out by others. However, one point that I do not think has been made sufficient strongly is the error in assuming that if the monolithic pension funds are dismantled they will automatically be replaced by more worthy and efficient individual investments. Surely the more likely scenario is the launch of a vast marketing exercise by the insurance companies, resulting in even greater monohthic investment concentration.

Also, it will be the pensioner who will have to pay for this exercise and the other expenses of these organisations who have the ability to reward themselves without revealing the extent to which they do so. The administration costs of private occupational pension schemes are kept firmly under control by the sponsoring employer as it is his money being spent. Not so the relative profligacy of the insurance companies, where it is the money of someone else, who is normally not even allowed to know how much is being spent until it is far too late to influence it.

Gibraltar shipping

From the Minister for Economic Development and Trade, Gibraliar Sir, As Minister entrusted with responsibility for the port of Gibraltar, I was very concerned at the inaccuracies in the article in The Times of September 28 entitled "Gibraltar ship concern". I would be very grateful if you would kindly publish this letter in order to clarify the various issues raised.

Firstly, and perhaps most importantly, there is no such thing as a Gibraltarian flag in respect of ship registration. Instead, vessels regis-tered in Gibraltar fly the Red Ensign in exactly the same way as the vessels registered here conform to the requirements of the UK Merchant Shipping Act, just at they would if registered at Southampton

Forty-eight vessels are at present registered in Gibraltar. The majority style of leadership as well as on policies. I again feel impelled to October 11.

From Mrs C. V. Longrigg Sir, Is it now considered much worse to give up all adulterous connexion than to abandon a wife and family?

Is it no longer possible to say to an adulterer who has seen the error of his/her ways, "Neither do I condemn thee" without incurring the accusation of condoning - even encouraging - adultery?

Am I alone in finding the "morality" of the 1980s confusing? Yours faithfully, C. V. LONGRIGG, 23 Norham Road, Messrs Vinson and Chappell are concerned to increase the general wealth of the pensioner. Their proposals are at best not going to change much and at worst are more likely to lead to unnecessary and unjustified spending along the way.

not, and indeed cannot, offer a flag of convenience. Moreover, it is actively concerned to maintain adequate safety standards and conditions of employment in its shipping fleet.

Hurtful language of service

From Ms Jean Mayland Sir, You are quite mistaken in your third leader of October 8. We cannot, we must not, erect a kind of cordon around "religious language".

"Religious language" is special. It speaks of the things of very deepest meaning and because of that it must be the best we can achieve. For many women the language of worship is increasingly hurtful and offensive in its use of "man" to describe us all. The purpose has not been to assert the superiority of the male sex, but that has been one of the harmful results, as recent studies of language and its effects have established. For many women and men the overbearingly masculine images used for God are inadequate and also give a distorted "image" of God's being.

The book published by "One" is more successful in suggesting ways of referring to human beings than it is in suggesting new images for God. This is generally true of all work in this area. Yet this does not mean that we should give up. On the contrary, we must work harder. We need to recover "feminine" images and mescalors from the Series was and metaphors from the Scriptures and tradition and also search for new ones to put alongside the old and enrich the vision.

Some of the worship material used by the World Council of Churches in its recent assembly in Vancouver was very exciting in this respect I served on the commission which produced the Alternative Service Book and I acknowledge our failures in this area. No one took me seriously when I raised the matter of "sexist" language. Only a few years later the situation is very different. Now the subject is taken increasingly seriously by women and men of all denominations. Not even a Times leader can hold back the tide. I remain yours faithfully, JEAN M. MAYLAND.

3 Minster Court, York. October 9.

From Ms Pauline Fielding and Mr

Sir. In our view your leader writer (October 8) misses the central point of the booklet, Bad Language in Church. The issue is not that the use of masculine pronouns for God is insulting to women, but that the exclusive use of masculine language to address God over-emphasises maleness to the detriment of God's femininity, and can therefore downgrade women. We believe that this lopsidedness is not present in the Scriptures. where we find God spoken of as one who brought you to birth", who "carried you on eagle's wings", who "cries like a woman in labour" longs to "gather your children like a hen gathers her brood", and whose spirit is described (in the Old Testament at least) by a feminine word. Yours sincerely, PAULINE FIELDING, Chairperson, PETER WEST, Vice-chairperson, One for Christian Renewal, 19 Steventon Road, Shepherds Bush, W12. October 9. From Mrs C. 1. C. Bosanquet Sir, Your leader on "Our Father. . ." (October 8) is over-paternal. If there is real need for inclusive words, especially pronouns, in religious language, surely posterity would welcome indications that our generation was seeking them, however clumsy the initial attempts. I believe there is a true need for inclusive words, and you tacitly come near to admitting this. To erect a "special kind of cordon" around past and present religious writings would deny our living language the possibility of growth.

This would eventually be resented by posterity. Yours sincerely. BARBARA S. BOSANQUET, Rock Moor. Alnwick, Northumberland. October 10.

The tank staff will, I am sure, be the first to acknowledge their indebtedness to William Froude — who, incidentally, was backed by the admiralty of the day in setting up the first ever ship model testing tank.

It is nonsense to say that the forces which govern the flow of water past a hull are "almost as much of a mystery as they have ever been", and a designer who adopts this attitude to the guidance of scientific ship hydrodynamics can expect to join the rule-of-thumb boatwrights of yesteryear. Entering academic life at the age of 58, he found British scholarship on the Soviet Union barely out of its infancy and the subsequent growth of this field at Oxford was much stimulated by the research and teaching activities of the Russian and East European Centre at the College of which Footman was the first director. A man of singular courtesy, sharp intelligence and great kindness, and a rare brand of wry wit, he adapted very readily to the academic world and was greatly respected by the community he had joined relatively late in life. David John Footman was born on September 17 1895, the son of a Church of England minister. He was educated at Mariborough and New College, Oxford, served during the Fust World War in the Royal Berkshire Regiment and was decorated with the Military Cross for bravery during the battle of the Somme, where he was also seriously wounded.

From 1919 to 1929 he served in the Levant Consular Service, an experience which provided the background and many of the characters for the witty and urbane novels he was to write later, (Half-way East (1935), Fig and Pepper (1936) and Pember-ton (1943)). In 1927 he had appear to great advantage in the autopsy, published today by the National Economic Development Council, of the great "model-rigging" row which erupted between the trade unions and Sir Geoffrey Howe, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, at a council meeting in April last year.

The unions had asked the Treasury to use its model of the economy to look at what would happen if the Government increased spending on investment, as they and the employers had been urging.

Naturally, they expecte the model to find in their favour, previous experience had suggested that it would. Instead the Chancellor presented them with figures purporting to show that higher government spend-ing would have only the briefest impact in stimulating the economy. Within five years output and employment would actually be lower than otherwise. Inflation would be much

This was obviously a happy result for the Chancellor, since it vindicated the Government's economic strategy. But it provoked howls of outrage from the unions who alleged that the model had been fixed.

The Neddy study puts a rather more sophisticated gloss on the matter. What happened, Neddy says, is that the Treasury had just amended its model. The new version incorporated much stronger "crowding out" effects than before.

Fiscal expansion led. through higher wages, to more rapid inflation, dampening consumer spending and worsening competitiveness. And the extra government borrowing pushed up interest rates, "crowding out" borrowing for private investment and driving the exchange rate higher, so that industry was priced out of international markets.

"Crowding out" exacerbated because Treasurey insisted on peg-

The Treasury does not ging money supply growth ppear to great advantage - wich would be a strange thing for a government set on fiscal expansion to do.

But the most recent version of the Treasury model has apparently toned down these effects. "It now seems unlikely that crowding out and inflation would in fact be as severe as presented to council in April 1982", Neddy says.

On the contrary, output (though not employment) is still higher after five years than it would otherwise have been. Inflation is also higher but, not by much.

Neddy also takes the opportunity to do some simulations of its own on the newest version of the Treasury model which bear an interesting similarity to projections recently done for The Times.

After testing the effects both of a government boost to demand and an increase in world trade, its paper concludes: "There is little doubt that expansion of demand, wether unilaterally or in conjuction with other countries, can result in output higher than otherwise for 3 to 4 years."

But inflation rises and the output gains fade away. Crowding out effects, while weaker than the Treasury said last year, still operate. Neddy has also looked at some supply side improve ments, notably lower pay deals, which it says would boost growth, raise employment and cut infaltion throughout the following five years. A marginal improvement in export performance coupled with lower earnings could reduce unemployment by well over 200,000 within three years, it says. Large scale expansion of demand cannot bring unemployment down permaneptly without some means of controlling inflation.

"But a better supply side performance means very high unemployment is nonetheless not inevitable Neddy concludes. There is some comfort there for both unions and the Chancellor.

Thermax in merger with metal firm

By Andrew Cornelius

V. W., the London-based metal fabricator, the shares of which were suspended at 70p on the USM in June, yesterday announced details of a merger with Thermex, an unquoted glass processing group.

The deal, which has to be approved by V. W. shareholders on November 4, effectively amounts to a reverse takeover of V. W. by Thermax.

Last year V. W. reported losses of £59,779, after tax and extraordinary items, against profit of £629,550 in the previous year. The newly-merged company will be chaired by Mr Harry Jackson, an associate director of GEC, and will be renamed V. W. Thermax. The group will have an annual iumover of £8m and will employ 370 people.

Under the terms of the deal, which has been agreed by the two boards, V. W. will acquire Thermax for £5.75m. A total of 4.75 million shares in the new company will then be offered for sale by tender at a minimum price of £1 per share.

. The board of Thermax indicated yesterday that the merger was a quick and simple route towards a stock market listing, V. W. shareholders find that their shares which were suspended at 70p in June are now being offered at a mini-mum of £1 each.

Mr Jackson, the new chairman of the company, will preside over a board which includes joint representation from the boards of both V. W. and Thermax. He said yesterday that the new group is keen to expand its operations to become a more broadly based industrial holding group.

V. W supplies fabrications to Ford, Foster Wheeler, Marconi and Plessey. Thermax is in the process of reorganizing and increasing capacity in response to anticipated demand for glass products for domestic appliances and car sunroofs. The fittere of K. O. Boardman, the Lancashire wholesale textile importers, depends on negotiations taking place with its seven different bankers to replace unsecured overdrafts with new secured loans, the company said in its Boardman lost £190,000, in the year to March, on sales of £15m after re-organization costs and disclosed bank loans of £2.6m, down slightly on the year before.

The group regularly made a profit of about £1m until 1978. Mr G. S. Ruiz and the Wrengate group, which then took charge, bowed out at the end of last month, selling its controlling 26 per cent stake.

Mr Alex Humphreys, who built up the C & C Supermarkets chain, and chairs Stoke City football club, has now bought a stake and joined the board.

Century Power & Light's interests are greatly improved by the early start of production from the Maureen field, which should rise to 90,000 barrels of oil per day in 1984; by the expected gas development in the Audrey field; and by other North Sea production prospects. In the U.S., notable successes are now being achieved. LMS has acquired a 30% holding in First Leisure Corporation, which

"The optimism I expressed at the last Annual General Meeting has been more than justified, with profit before taxation climbing to a half-year level of £4:1 million. This compares with £1.1 million in the first six months and £3:2 million in the whole of 1982. An interim dividend of 2.5p per share (1982: 2p per share) has been declared.

Group auction sales have improved by 40% to £119 million (£85 million in the first half of 1982).

The Group continues to give high priority to controlling expenditure and in the period under review. Group expenditure after allowing for the variation in currency rates has increased by just over 5%.

The regeneration of confidence in the international Art Market which has been under way for some twelve months is continuing. In every part of the world where we operate these are encouraging signs of an upturn in business. The life of the self-employed entrepreneur, in Mr Stevenson's presentation, is not one of perpetual grind and sacrifice it is rarely, for example, necessary to mortgage one's house to raise finance and one is free from a good deal of the grind and poredom of operating in a bureaucracy: the contribution to. social welfare in job creation is one of the more satisfying

If such an effect really has occurred, we might reasonably expect to observe two conse-quences. First, it would be likely that in the arts, politics, pure sciences or whatever other area of national life had higher social prestige than business, performance would be above the international norm. And, second, one might (given the relatively free international movement of entrepreneurs and of capital into Britain over the last 100 years) expect foreigners and foreign corporations to have played a disproportionate-

The demand for electrical products - based as it was on high income luxuries and urban needs - was initially higher in Britain than elsewhere. Yet a trade deficit in electrical engin cering products soon developed particularly in the technically advanced sectors. Electrifi cation progressed more slowly in Britain than in America and more strikingly, even than in the then very much poorer Overseas entrepreneurs also played a crucial role in that other growth industry of the sector. Immigrants continued to exercise a significant influence on British business through the central European persecutions of the 1930s to the later voluntary inward migration of names in the modern headling such as Ian MacGregor and Si Michael Edwardes.

It is perhaps too early to judge whether more recent waves of coloured immigrants have enriched Britain's entrepreneurial stock, but already examples can be found. The clearest historical lesson one could derive for the present government might lead to a policy recommendation that a new Statue of Liberty should be erected in London's derelict dockland. On it would be written: "Give me your Tamils, your Hongkong Chinese, your East African Asians", with the customary sentiments of wel-

There are at least signs that British social attitudes to business are changing. I am not here referring only to the enochal governmental changes of the last four years.

The establishment of two maior business schools in London and Manchester in 1965, for example, follower many decades of unsuccessful attempts to persuade business-men and academics to support similar initiatives. These, and other new business schools, have prospered, despite being initially branded by some Conservatives as a socialist plot to undermine the spirit of British business.

The change could be seen also in the foundation of business sections in the major quality newspapers at about the same time. The Times can no longer, as it did in the 1950s, write the obituary of the head of one of Britain's largest manufacturing concerns without devoting more than one sentence to his business activities.

entrants to business orientated degree subjects, subjects like electrical engineering, have shot traditionally prestigious subjects like the classics have rapidly falling standards. On graduation, students with first or good second class honours degrees, who might once have looked first to the Civil Service, are now giving equal or greater attention to business.

But if history has any lessons, it is that social changes are gradual, and that their impact on business performance can only be measured in gener-

Battles in store

Some set piece planning battles cormal shopping hours - are likely in the South east including Saturday nights and are likely in the South east before long as the big retailers once again take on the planners.

The battleground will probably be along the line of the new M25 where one or two retailers hope to push through per-mission to establish superstores. Local authority attitudes to superstores has softened over the last few years, but those in the South east are still very

The retailers also complain the the planners have failed to keep up to date with new trends. The result is that they do not appreciate how floorspace needs have changed. For instance J. Sainsbury stores have had sales floorspace of between 17,000 and 20,000 sq ft for some years. But the amount of ancillary space for food preparation, storage and staff has grown, pushing up the gross area substantially. The Department of the Environment says that planning applications now run smoothly. But is still takes Asda four and a half years to complete its average superstore - four years to get the application through and a maximum of 46 weeks to build it. Mr Phil Harris, the chairman of the Harris Queen-sway carpet retailing chain, would like to see all his products sold from under one roof on an out of town site, and expanded to include electrical durables with a large food supermarket next door. This ideal is still a long way off.

• Town centre shopping de-velopments are evolving and this Monday sees the opening of Capital & Counties' The Rid-ings in Wakefield. The 250,000 sq ft Ridings is the first shopping centre in Britain to include a "food court" within in an attempt to prevent it being just another mail.

The Ridings' food court is called The Garden and has 10 franchises ranging from pizzas a French patisserie. Customers buy from whichever food shop they like and then go and sit down under an atrium to eat. All the franchises are small firms with none of the big multiples represented. The idea is that the food outlets will remain open for more than just Sundays. Uncertainty about what will happen to new town assets when the development corporations are wound up is worrying some tenants who want to renew their leases but are unsure who their new inndiced may be. Three development corporations - Basildon, Northampton and Redditch -are due to be wound up by December next year. A further five have target dates in 1985.

Mr Christopher Murphy, MP for Welwyn and Hatfield, was told that formal consultations will be started. The most likely outcome would be that the commercial assets would be transferred to the Commission for New Towns if they were not sold off by the development corporations before they were wound up. The Commission would then dispose of the assets. No clear pattern has emerged from the winding up of the first generation new towns such as Crawley where piccemeal solutions were foun

Officials in the affected new towns are worried by the lack of a firm decision because it makes their job of attracting big companies from London all but impossible. The believe the Government has three basic options, none of which they are keen on.

The solutions are: first, to pass on assets to the New Towns & Commission. This would mean setting up a local management centre, probably using the existing development corporation management - in effect simply replacing one quango with another.

Second, the Governmen could take over the assets and sell them to the English Industrial Estates Corporation, Third, they could be sold on the open market as suggested in the parliamentary answer, which organization because it would be difficult to handle from London. Given the short time available it seems unlikely that the development corporations could complete many sales before they are wound up. The housing stock is less of a problem - it would be passed direct to the local authorities.

Threat to small car production in US From Bailey Morris, Washington

The United States car indus-try has threatened to begin Motors' venture with Toyota producing small cars in cheap-labour countries at a cost of thousands of American jobs if the government allows a joint venture between General Motors and Toyota to go ahead. BOXING

The haunting that will pursue Bruno along the Lawless road to fame

Terry Lawless said a week confused and generally too rigid British Boxing Board of Control ago that if his boxer, Frank like a tank commander trying to can sort out the wrangle Bruno, performed to his satisfaction against the heavily muscled former convict, Floyd Jumbo Cummings, he might Bruno's coach, Leroy overlook a bout with Joe Caldwell, who was specially Bugner and go for another American with television appeal in the United States.

Bruno not only stopped Cummings in the seventh round at the Albert Hall on Tuesday, he also went one better than one of the top-ranked heavyweights. Tim Witherspoon, who beat Cummings on points. So on the face of it Bruno's next opponent should be slightly higher in class and status. But Lawless is unlikely to fall for that sort of logic, specially after the clout that had Bruno out out on the that had Bruno out cold on his feet at the end of the first round, it was not even a classic punch, which would have really been the end for the British boxer, even with the bell coming as it did to his rescue. The right came from some-where behind the Albert Mem-orial and Bruno should have seen it coming from across the park. Bruno's nervous system switched off, leaving us with the chilling spectacle of that formidable figure momentarily paralysed in a standing position. It will haunt Lawless for a long

While it would be unfair to play down the incredible courage it needed to go out after that blow and take charge, it would be equally damaging to Bruno to lose sight of his limitations exposed by that incident. It can be argued that recovering from blows like that is what the game is about but, when viewed against the lack of fitness of Cummings, Bruno can count himself lucky that the 33-yearold American was fighting for breath after his first-round exertions.

I would not have put money on Cummings lasting the course of a fathers' race on school sports day. Also, the American's bull-ring charges made him an ideal target for spearing as he ran out of puff.

It took Bruno a good two rounds to recover from that setback and at that time his shortcoming became obvious. He had no defence, he was unable to ride punches, he was

It is not Bruno.

It will be interesting to see six or told Cummings to get up what Lawless's next move will and get on with it or ruled that be. Since there are no more the American was no longer heavyweights in this country able to defend himself. Instead there seems no one else to turn Jacobs called the whole thing too except Big Joe or the off "to save Cummings further Europeans. Bruno can hardly go punishment." Still, in Britain back to American pushovers the referee is the boss. like Bill Sharkey. The Bugner

Brano: limitations

The crowd tonight at Frank contest depends of whether the Warren's show at the Blooms-bury Crest Hotel will be taking a lot on trust, through no fault of the promoter. His first choice for Jimmy Price, the middleweight, was Eddie Gazo, but the Nicaraguan got himself knocked out by John Mugabi in Atlantic City. His replacement is Sammy Floyd, from Detroit, who has won seven of his 27 bouts. Floyd clearly does not like to be hit too hard. He has been stopped by Fulgencio Obelme-iias and Mugabi. But beware late replacements, as John Conteh will tell you.

John L Gardner's opponent, Steve Gee, also has cried off. He takes on an American, Lou Benson. The white American has had 14 wins in his 41 contests. He has met some hard men like Broad, Braxton and Chapman and is generally regarded as an awkward customer against whom it is difficult to look good. I hope Gardner's father will not be too disappointed if John L has a tough time. When he heard that his son was going to meet Benson he said "That softie on the television? I can beat him".

End of an era offers new hope

By Conrad Voss Bark From Mitchell Platts Pahit Beach

Fishermen are used to the pollution of their lakes and rivers by farm and industrial waste seeping into the water from the land but have not grasped the idea that there is a new enemy above them. An acid sky.

The acid, contained in smoke from oil and coal-burning power stations and factories, previously localised, is now lifted by high chimneys into the upper air drifts, is carried hundreds of miles and falls is snow and rain on previously unspoilt country.

The chairman of the EEC's advisory committee on fish farming. Graham Gordon, who rears trout at a fish farm in Galloway in Scotland, told a conference at Two Lakes in Hampshire last weekend that he's already lost 20,000 fish because of acid waters.

"Its killing the wild fish on my farm - one of the first to show signs of it in Britain. We're seeing the first signs here that they saw in Norway 20 years ago. Unless its stopped it'll affect everything, trees, birds, vegetation, the very balance of mature as we know it."

nature as we know it."

A former conservator of the Forestry Commission in sonthern Scotland, E. J. M. Davis, said there were some lovely little hill locks in Galloway that had been affected. There was not a fish in Loch Enoch now, and Loch Grannoch, which had a long history of successful fishing, had become sterile. The rain had come down like vinegar on Loch Dee and killed all the young fish. "Great effors had been made to revive Loch Dee and it was now a put-and-take fishery.

Dr Rosseland, of the Norwegian

Dr Rosseland, of the Norwegian Directorate of Wildlife, told the conference that many of the salmon rivers in southern and south-western Norway no longer held fish. Dr Bengtsson, of the Swedish National Board of Fisheries, said that 20,000 of the country's 90,000 lakes were now affected by increased acidity and of that 20,000 some 5,000 were badly affected: some completely badly affected: some completely empty of fish, some with just a few surviving. The acid rain came to Sweden from all over Europe but England was the worst offender. Dr Dodge, of the Canadian Ministry of National Resources, gave a full account of their problems from the United States smoke drifts.

United States smoke drifts.

After a day of gloomy prophecies, the anglers went unbopefully to tea, having been told by the scientists that putting lime into their rivers and lakes was only a palliative, that Britain was lagging behind Europe in cleaning our smoke emissions, and that the best long-term solution was for all industrial countries to go over as soon as possible to nuclear Tokyo, (AFP) - Lupe Madera, Mexico's Boxing Association (WBA) junior flyweight champion, arrived here yesterday for a title bout with Katsuo Tokashiki of Japan in Sappoeo, on October 23.

Northern Ireland's hopes of competing in the European championship finals in France next year evaporated in the sunshine of Ankara before a 35,000 crowd here yesterday. "We felt the stigma of drug use has hart the sport and we want to eliminte it," Larry Fleisher, general counsel for the players' union said. Many observers were surprised that the union had consented to a programme which, among other things, provides for random urine analyses.

But Bob Lanier of the Milwankee Bucks, the President of the players' union, said: "By telling the world that we, as professional basketball players, will not tolerate the use of illegal drugs, we are setting a new standard, thing that is absolutely essential

"There is no question that pro-fessional baskethall players are role models for young people all over the country, and particularly in inner cities," Lanier added, alluding to the fact that about 85 per cent of the league's players are black, and are heroes to many black youngsters. The people who run the nation's other major league sports - baseball, football and ice bockey - have also being accused of hoping that the drug problem would somehow resolve itself.

Two weeks ago, John Ziegler, president of the National Hockey League, suspended Ric Natiress of the Montreal Canadiens for 40 games of the current season following his conviction for possession of hashish and marijuana. Ziegler said: "To any the next tree or will season follows: who new use or may want to use illegal drugs, we say this: We do not want you. Get out and stay out of our business'." Although a large number of American football and basketball players have admitted drug use - and in many cases have returned to competition after receiving detoxification treatment – a far greater numbe of baseball players have confessed to drag abuse. The most celebrated case involving baseball and drugs revolved aroun Howe, an outstanding young relief pitcher. After undergoing treatment for cocaine abuse last winter, Howe was suspended three times that season, the third time after he refused a medical examination.

In addition, Howe was fined $54,000 by the baseball com-missioner, Bowie Kuhn, after his second suspension. Howe's third suspension caused him to miss the last two weeks of the regular season and two weeks of the regular season and the current baseball play-offs. He has since reentered a drug rehabilitation centre. "I got that way because I wasn't afraid of anything or anybody", said Howe, who was the National League's "Rookie of the Year" in 1981. "But I found out it was something I couldn't beat."

Piggott poised to swoop on speedy Salieri

With £25,000 added to the they appear to have gone off the sweepstakes, the Bisquit Cognac Challenge Stakes is the centrepiece of today's programme at Newmarket. Noalcoholic won this group three pattern race 12 months ago and he is in the field again, his reputation considerably enhanced in the meantime by that courageous front-running performance in the Sussex Stakes at Goodwood. George Duffield, his regular rider, seems bound to adopt similar forcing tactics again just as he did in this event last year when he galloped Motavato into the ground. This time, though, he may fail to hold Lester Piggott and Salieri at bay. In fact, Noalcoholic's cut and thrust style of running could easily play into Piggott's hands as they will give him a lead and smalle him to keep Salieri enable him to keep Salieri covered up and poised to strike in the seventh and last furlong.

Piggott got the lead that he wanted from that flying filly Soba when Salieri was just pipped at Doncaster by Annie Edge whom he will be meeting

Edge whom he will be meeting on 10 lb better terms now.

Salieri's chance of further success has been improved by the late withdrawal yesterday of Silver Dip who ran him so close at Ascot. Collegian, my selection for the Graham Ford Nursery, was badly drawn for her last race at Kempton. She deserves anoth chance especially as she had won her two previous races at Yarmouth and Ripon, the latter being a dead-heat with that sharp filly Leipzig.

It will take a smart newcomer to beat Falstaff and Sheer Heights in the Chesterton Maiden Stakes, Falsaff finished third behind the Dewhurst Stakes contender Rainbow Quest in his only race, while Sheer heights was runner-up to Carocrest at Salisbury. In this instance I prefer Falstaff.

As so often in the past, though, the visitors were unable to maintain the impetus so that with stiffer teams ahead it looks unlikely that they will realize the hopes of Shiggy Konno, team manager, of winning three of five manches in Wales. Japan held tightly and confidently at the scrum, then Pembrokeshine, putting on the second shove, sent them recling back in disarray. When the ball emerged Phillips found a gap at the side to find his back row in support and for Morroney to go over and score. The Pembrokeshire pack, marshalled by Phillips, with his clever chips to the corner, and John kicking diagonally with the cross wind, kept up the pressure. Jahangir's easy title win

Zaman's attempt to end his fellow-Pakistani Jahangir Khan's 31-Pakistani Jahangir Khan's 31-month unbeaten run never got off the ground in the Pilkington sponsored world championship final here. Jahangir, aged 19, won 9-0, 9-4, 9-3 in only 29 minutes to record his fourth victory over Qumar in a big final this year. Qamar had hoped to unsettle Jahangir by going for his shots and tiring him out by making him run; but such was Jahangir's anticipation but such was Jahaneir's anticipation that his opponent was rarely able to stretch him. Qamar contributed to his own downfall with a series of shots into the tin.

Only in the final game was he able to string together more than two points at a time, coming back from 0-7 to 3-7; but by then his fate was sealed. Afterwards Jahangir, a world champion since he was 17 and Jahangir: still unbeaten unbeaten since April 1981, said that he had been surprised by the ease of his win.

Though the final was one-sided. Qamar played his part in letting the match flow. Only 10 lets were called in contrast to the 58 in the thirdplace play-off between Stuart Davenport, of New Zealand, and Hiddy Jahan, of England. Davenport, ranked sixth in the

The Times Guide to career development

Your own office at the top

The secret of success for the manager who wants to climb to the chief executive's office is the same as in anything else: it is merely a matter of doing all the little things right - every day. But as well as ability and hard work, luck is needed Certainly, though, the days of nepotism and old-boy networks have largely gone.

During the next three weeks we will look at the different routes pursued by a selection of chief executives. We have broadly categorized these as: climbing the corporate ladder, going to business school, and founding your own company. It is, however, important to note that all chief executives are individuals and that crude facts can blur reality. For instance, most of the present and immediate past generation of chief executives (appointed typically in their fifties) experienced military service, and therefore carried significant life-or-death responsibility while still young. This may not be fully reflected in their CVs but may have added immeasurably to their experience and influenced their style of

Patronage by a senior can be helpful

Long hours are a common factor in the lives of careerists. Most modern top executives continue to work long hours and spend many nights away from home even when they get to the chief's office. In a questionnaire answered by 423 top. UK executives, the Heidrick and Struggles consultancy found that the typical chief executive works a 52hour week and travels overseas on business for five weeks a year. The predominant motivating element was found to be "personal satisfaction", which ranked far ahead of "continued high earnings and pros-

MARKET PLACE-

Patricia Tisdall introduces a four-part series on how a modern manager makes it to chief executive still come from within the survey found that 75 per cent of chief executives had been promoted internally. Our own researches reveal that the chief executives of nine of the UK's 10 biggest companies have spent most of their working lives in the same organization. Moreover, there is little sign of change in the offing since 54 per cent of the survey's respondents expected their successors to be a current subordinate and further 20 per cent expected an appointment to come from within the come street.

The statistics suggest that the ambitious middle manager would do well to pick an organization early in his career and try to catch the eye of the corporate talent-spotters. The most common sector for recruitment of top executives is marketing followed by finance. A common problem for specialists, particularly in high-technology areas, is that simply keeping on top of their subject is a full-time activity. There is little energy to spare to absorb wider business or social horizons or to develop leadership through persuading others rather than by personal

Many middle managers find that patronage or even advice by a respected senior executive is helpful in making the break into general management. Formal business cour-ses have also proved useful, if only in giving familiarity with the vocabulary used by other specialist colleagues. There are some areas such as marketing and more recently computer technology which permeate most aspects of modern business. It is significant that the survey found tember rose by over 52 per cent on last year. This indicates that the average time taken by employers to fill vacancies is increasing. The vacancies taking longest to fill that 61 per cent of chief executives claimed experience of marketing while 47 per cent said they were familiar with new technology.

Less established than for part-time or short business courses is the case for the ful-time business administration Masters degree. However the preliminary evidence from the first generation of British MBAs, who are mostly still only in their early forties, is impressive. More than 40 per cent are reckoned to havereached director level or above.

The pleasures and risks of doing it yourself

There is certainly no doubt that modern managers generally hold higher educational qualifications than their predecessors. The survey found the 60 per cent of chief executives held either a university degree or some technical or prosional qualification and that 19 per cent had been to business school.

The most frequent comment made by participants on business school courses is that it improves their selfconfidence. The area where most self-confidence is needed is in starting a business, where, at least in the early days, proprietors are likely to have to rely entirely on their own judgment. The smaller the business, the closer is the proprietor to the market place. This means not only developing communicating skills in order to expand but also acquiring a sales rep's resilience in approaching potential customers. Personal satisfaction may be higher in taking the do-it-yourself route to the chief executive's office but so are risks. A high proportion of new businesses fail and failure often means not only the loss of a job but also personal assets such as a car and a house. However, at least according to the graphologists, extreme bold-ness is a hallmark of all potential high fivers, whichever route they follow.

-Philip Schofield

Welfare Officer

the Metropolitan Police in London.

Reporting to the Assistant Commissioner, Personnel and fraining, the successful candidate will be required to emonstrate a capacity to understand and deal with the problems of police officers with particular reference to their personal, family, matrimonial and financial difficulties, often used by the stresses and strains of police work in London. Additionally he or she will be responsible for dealing with widows and pensions, charitable funds, sport and related social activities and for giving advice on retirement opportunities. A working knowledge of the current fiscal and legal procedures in this field is desirable.

Operating with a high degree of autonomy, within an extensive multi-discipline Personnel Department, he or she will also have the opportunity to develop the welfare function to meet the demands of a large modern and rapidly changing police force.

Ideally aged 40-50 (but certainly under 55), the successful candidate will have appropriate experience in personnel management, counselling, and all aspects of social welfare. He or she will need imagination and sensitivity, coupled with organisational flair and the ability to cope with the welfare needs of 27,000 officers. The successful candidate will operate at all levels of management. For this key post, based in central London, a salary within the scale of £13,649 rising to £17,906 per annum, inclusive of London weighting, is offered. There is a generous leave allowance and the post is pensionable.

Applications, in the first instance, should be made to The Establishment Officer, Room 213 (WO/T), 105 Regency Street, London SW1P 4AN, or by

Public Appointments

A challenging role in Housing Management £17,280-£18,486 (award pending)

In the City of Cambridge, housing is the Executive. Experience of working with Council's highest priority and we have a wide range of new initiatives under way. These include revising the allocation system; reviewing housing needs and policies and a comprehensive programme of environmental improvements and community development on council

It is, therefore, essential that our new City Housing Manager should have the ability and motivation necessary to play a leading role in successfully developing and implementing wide ranging policies in both the private and public sectors. First and foremost, the man or woman we appoint must have had considerable experience as a senior manager, although not necessarily in local government. A thorough appreciation of the strategic role of a Housing Manager is also essential together with the ability to lead and motivate staff and contribute to the work of the Chief Officer's management team under the direction of the Chief the voluntary sector would be useful and although a professional qualification in housing is desirable, it is not essential. This challenging management role calls for considerable organising. administrative and supervisory skills coupled with a thorough commitment to the Council's housing policies. Salary will be in the range £17,280-£18,486 per annum (salary award pending) plus car allowance, temporary: housing and relocation expenses. Further details and an application form, returnable by 31st October 1985, can be obtained from the Personnel Officer, City of Cambridge, Guildhall, Cambridge CB2 3QJ. Telephone: Cambridge (0223) 358977 ext 270. For an informal discussion on the requirements of this appointment, telephone the Chief Executive, Mr G G Datson, on

Government committed to making cuts in tax

Would inflation be lower Would growth be much higher? Would there be more jobs, higher standards in schools, better health care? He doubted whether there could be reassin ing answers.

Mr Lawson had told the conference that the economy appeared to be growing up to 3 per cent rather than the 2 per cent forecast at the time of the budget. Sir Ian suggested that the growth was fully accounted for by personal and government consumption and that it had coincided with a serious weaking of the economy.

Observing that public expendi ture was to be cut "for the umpteenth time since 1979" Sir lan said that it would be an affront both to commonsens and to Toryism if anything were done to make the unemployed worse off. It would be to doublecross them. To inflict greater hardship on the unemployed in order to cut taxes on the better off should be even kept the peace. "To these people, the rhetoric of defence is not enough.

"They have to be satisfied that governments are as con-cerned to reduce the scale of armaments as they are to explain the need for adequate defences in the first place. We have ot satisfy this yearning and do it as part of an alliance facing a monlithic opponent".

He added: "We could each gain headlines but lose credi-bility if every Western ally were to be seen arging publicly about their tactics towards the Sovie Union. But that is not a case for saying that we should not talk to the Soviet Union".

Mrs Thatcher said during her recent visit to Washington stand ready, if and when the circumstances are right, to talk to the Soviet leadership". She also said "It would seem sensible at some stage - and it is difficult to define when - that we do have more talks at all

Freud completes his grand masterpiece

By Geraldine Norman

Lucian Freud, the great British painter and grandson of Sig-mand Frend, has been dreaming for many years of a big picture in the spirit and tradition of the Old Masters. Now finished after three years work, it is the largest pointing he has ever executed painting he has ever executed and his only painting to include and his only painting to increae more than two figures.

The painting entitled "Large Interior, W.11 (after Wat-teau)", which measures "3in by 78in, is to be shown in a one-painting exhibition at Agnew's in Bond Street, London, from The composition is based on a charming little painting by the short-lived eighteenth centary Freach master Antoine Watteau entitled "Pierrot Content". The Wattean be-longs to Baron Heinrich Thyssen-Bornemisza, the million-aire industrialist whose picture collection at Lugano in Switzer-land is one of the greatest in private hands anywhere in the Only old friends sit for Frend, for it is a very time-consuming business and each of the models for the new group On the right is an old friend

Fread's daughter is depicted playing the mandolin next to another close friend who posed for a painting bought by the British Council last year entitled "Naked Girl with Egg". The child is a daughter of friends and the setting is Fread's over and the setting is Frend's own studio in Notting Hill, London. The painting now belongs to Mr James Kirkman, Freud's agent, and is not for sale. The Agnew exhibition will include a manher of drawings, some of which are not yet sold.

mini after it was hired. They suspected that Mr Waldorf might be Mr Martin and when the car was stuck at a traffic jam, constable Finch was sent to check. He knew Martin because he had taken part in his arrest some months before.

Sir Michael said: "there is no doubt that Finch had only been told to see if the man was Martin". He had been told not

As Constable Finch walked forward he drew his revolver, although police rules allow guas to be anholstered only for firing.

Constable Finch thought he indentified Mr Waldorf as Martin. The detective was said to have told an investigator later that he shouted that he was an armed policeman, but Sir Michael said witnesses did

Then seeing a "sudden" movement for the man he took to be Martin, Constable Finch opened fire. Sir Michael said the people in the car were given no chance to surrender.

Amother officer opened fire, then Constable Jardine moved forward, by which time Mr Waldorf was langing out of the car through the driver's door. Constable Jardine from a distance of between 6 to 12 feet fired three shots at his head. Two of the shots missed.

Constable Jardine was al leged to have said later that Mr Waldolf was still moving and he thought he was still a threat. Asked what the shots were intended to achieve, he was siad to have told a senior police officer: "I intended to totally incapacitate him and the only way to do that with a gent is to kill him".

Sir Michael said that after Constable Jardine stepped firing, Constable Finch hit Mr Waldorf on the head with his empty pistol. Witnesses said

When questioned later Con-stable Finch was, said to have claimed that he hit the man to stop him moving. As he stood over the man with his gan and Mr Waldorf was handcuffed,

A battle of vowels and hair styles

The Conservative Conference, by its applause yester-day, seemed agreed that Mr Michael Heseltine, the Secretary of State for Defence, had ever since his appointment been doing a fine job in his capacity as the downmarket Lady Olga Maitland.

The experts such as Lady Olga deal with grand strategy. the more technical aspects of weapons systems, balanced force reductions, and so on.
Mr Heseltine's job is to deliver simple, but sincere appeals. defending the British nuclear deterrent and rebutting the peace movement, to normallyapolitical groups such as the Conservative Party.

His campaign is effective because he does not make out that he is anything other than an ordinary husband from an unremarkable background of property dealing and magazine publishing. He deserved the acclaim he received from the conference when he sat down yesterday. But Lady Olga herself spoke too, and achieved a scarecely less well deserved succes

She, it may be remembered, is the founder of the anti-uni-lateralist organization. Families For Peace. By profession she is a gossip columnist. She prefers to be called a "diarist". as if she were akin to Sir Harold Nicolson rather than to Mr Nigel Dempster. So admirable is her organization, she shall have her wish here. Anyway, diarist of not, the work of this graceful patrician can be found in the Sunday Express, protected by only a few pages from the plebian grunts of Sir John Junor's

She has been touring the conference all through the long season, holding fringe meetings and being shricked at by peace-lovers largely of her own sex. But yesterday she was safe at last. She came before the conference to be warmly received for standing for the old Tory attitude to defence and, perhaps above all, the old Tory attitude to defence and, perhaps above all, the old Tory attitude to defence and, perhaps above all, the old Tory attitude towards vowels (as was pointed out in this space last week, in her speeches Nato tends to come out as what one might assume to be a hairspray call Neato, and support for Nato in the Home Counties is none the worse for that).

Yesterday she told her case for fellow Conservatives of the workforce.

to deny her a "fair hearing" or as she put it, "a fear hairing". Encased in a cream suit, every hair held in position by blasts Neato, she incited Conservative womanhood to join her in her crusade. As she was applauded from the rostrum. Conservative womanhood pressed. forward to congratulate her, or perhaps to secure the name of her dressmaker, for there were major issues at stake.

When it came to Mr Heseltine's turn, he could match the cut of the suit, but had no hope of matching the cut of the vowels. His are the unpretentious tones of the rustic estate agents of the Thames Valley, the sturdy folk who sent him back to Parliament with fine majorities at each general election. But he too had apparently been at the Several aerosols of the substance appeared to have been used to keep the famous Danny La Rue-inspired bouffant in position for the tumultuous duration of the speech. For 20 minutes. Mr Heseltine's jowis shook as he breathed defiance against Mr Andropov, Mr Neil Kinnock, Mr David Steel, Dr David Owen and the other forces who stood between him and supreme power. The bouffant stayed in position.

Then, in mid-peroration, the hair's right hand support appeared to give way and appeared to give way and crashed towards an expensively padded shoulder. As Lady Olga would put it, people sitting nearby were in fear of a hairing. Miraculously, no-one was hurt.

In accordance with tradition, Mr Heseltine got his standing ovation.

Otherwise, it was rather a lugubrous day Mr John Biffen, the Leader of the Commons, made a subtle and elegant speech completiy re-butting the case for pro-portional representation, the sort of speech wasted on a conference. Mr Nigel Lawson. the Chancellor, wa over-whelmingly convincing on the economy, but oddly subdued.
